Discretion of District Court to Amend Temporary Protective Order — Evidence of Domestic Violence Prior to Birth of Child Irrelevant to Determination of Child Custody: Following incidents of domestic abuse unwitnessed by the parties' child, the father received a temporary protective order prohibiting contact by the mother with both the husband and child. The court subsequently held a hearing regarding the temporary order pursuant to 40-15-202 and amended the protective order by extending it for an additional 6 months as to the husband, but found that the child was not in substantial danger, so the order was not extended to the child. Rather, the court issued an interim parenting plan that provided primary residential custody to the mother. The father appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. It is within the discretion of the District Court, upon a showing of good cause, to continue, amend, or make permanent a protection order, and its decision will not be overturned absent an abuse of that discretion. Here, the District Court properly considered the child's best interests in fashioning the interim parenting plan, and correctly declined to limit the mother's contact with the child through the protective order. Evidence of alleged incidents of domestic violence prior to the couple's marriage and the birth of the child was irrelevant. In re Schiller, 2002 MT 103, 309 M 431, 47 P3d 816 (2002), distinguishing Stoneman v. Drollinger, 2000 MT 274, 302 M 107, 14 P3d 12 (2000).

Jurisdiction, Venue, and Appeal — Registration of Orders

40-15-301. Jurisdiction and venue.

Compiler's Comments

1999 Amendment: Chapter 311 in (2) at beginning of first sentence substituted "dissolution of marriage or parenting action" for "divorce or custody action", inserted fourth sentence requiring court to conduct hearing unless both parties and courts agree hearing may be conducted in limited jurisdiction court, in fifth sentence substituted "shall" for "may" and after "receipt" inserted "of the pleadings, unless the hearing is continued at the request of either party for good cause or by the court", and inserted sixth sentence requiring order of protection to remain in effect until hearing if hearing continued; inserted (3) providing procedure when one party to protection order files for dissolution of marriage of parenting action after filing of protection order but before occurrence of hearing; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 15, 1999.

Case Notes

Reversible Error for District Court to Adopt Terms of Protective Order Unrelated to Those Agreed to at Hearing or by Stipulation: Wife Lundstrom received a protective order in Justice's Court requiring husband Scholz to notify her when he intended to access the parties' property for business purposes. Lundstrom then filed a marriage dissolution petition in District Court, and Scholz subsequently petitioned the District Court under the same cause number to dismiss or modify the protective order. The District Court held a hearing to consider Scholz's petition and agreed to modify the protective order to allow Scholz more liberal access to the property, requesting both parties to submit proposed orders memorializing the terms agreed upon at the hearing. The court then signed the order prepared by Lundstrom's counsel. Scholz moved to reconsider, asserting that the order contained terms contradictory to those agreed upon at the hearing, and later moved for the District Court to dismiss the protective order, but Lundstrom did not answer either motion. Both motions were denied, and Scholz appealed. The Supreme Court first considered whether the District Court properly exercised its jurisdiction over the Justice's Court protective order. Although Justices' Courts and District Courts have concurrent jurisdiction to hear and issue protective orders, a District Court may not take jurisdiction of a Justice's Court case on its own initiative. However, in this case, Scholz availed himself of the District Court's jurisdiction by petitioning to dismiss or modify the protective order and could not then challenge the District Court's jurisdiction. However, the District Court committed reversible error by adopting verbatim Lundstrom's proposed modification of the protective order because the modification order contained significant deviations from the issues covered at the hearing and the court lacked authority to order terms contradictory to matters discussed or completely absent at the hearing. The District Court should have deviated from its original determination at the hearing to no greater extent than the parties actually agreed by stipulation. The case was remanded for further proceedings. In re Marriage of Lundstrom & Scholz, 2007 MT 304, 340 M 83, 172 P3d 588 (2007), following In re Custody of C.S.F., 232 M 204, 755 P2d 578 (1988).

TITLE 41
MINORS

CHAPTER 1
RIGHTS AND OBLIGATIONS OF MINORS

Part 1
Minority

41-1-101. Minors and adults defined.

Case Notes

Interpretation of Decree Provision on Termination of Support Obligation: In the decree of dissolution, the paragraph immediately following the paragraph concerning payment of child support provided that "Upon termination of the child support obligation" the appellant must pay the respondent maintenance until her death or remarriage. A dispute arose over the meaning of "termination of the child support obligation". The Supreme Court held that the District Court's ruling that the obligation terminated when the appellant stopped making monthly child support payments, rather than when the youngest child turned 18, was not clearly erroneous. In re Marriage of Jones, 218 M 441, 709 P2d 158, 42 St. Rep. 1722 (1985).

Custody and Support — "Child" Defined — Majority Age: Upon attaining the age of 18 a person is an adult and is no longer a "child" within the purview of 40-6-211 of whom parents are entitled to custody or to whom parents are obligated for support, despite the fact that at the time of the decree the legal age was 21. Chrestenson v. Chrestenson, 180 M 96, 589 P2d 148 (1979).

Family Allowance From Estate: When daughter became 18 years old, her right to receive a family allowance under sections 91-2401 through 91-2403, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed), terminated. In re Hall's Estate, 124 M 355, 224 P2d 138 (1950).

Admission to State School for Girls: The controlling element in juvenile laws is age, not minority. Hence, contention that female cannot be committed to State Vocational School for Girls (Mountain View School) after she reaches age of majority cannot be sustained. State ex rel. Foot v. District Court, 77 M 290, 250 P 973, 49 ALR 398 (1926).

Attorney General's Opinions

Residence of Minor for Voting Purposes: Unemancipated minors are residents of the place their parents reside and may register to vote in that place if they will be 18 years of age at the time of the election. 34 A.G. Op. 13 (1971).

41-1-102. Periods of minority — how calculated.

Case Notes

No Wrongful Death Action for Death of Unborn Child: In view of the rule for calculating the periods of minority set forth in 41-1-102, an unborn fetus is not a "minor child" within the meaning of 27-1-512 and thus an action for the wrongful death of an unborn child cannot be maintained under present state law. Kuhnke v. Fisher, 210 M 114, 683 P2d 916, 41 St. Rep. 952 (1984). See also Strzelczyk v. Jett, 264 M 153, 870 P2d 730, 51 St. Rep. 206 (1994).

41-1-103. Unborn children.

Case Notes

Supreme Court Recognizes Wrongful Death Claim for Stillborn Fetus: Alexa Strzelczyk brought a wrongful death action against her physician for the death of her full-term, stillborn fetus. The defendant, Jett, removed the case to federal court because neither party still resided in Montana. The federal court certified the case to the state Supreme Court because of the state court's decision in Kuhnke v. Fisher, 210 M 114, 683 P2d 916 (1984), holding that under state law at that time, wrongful death statutes did not support a claim for the death of a stillborn fetus. The federal court noted that the statutes had been revised since the 1984 decision. The Supreme Court ruled that the revised statutes provided for an action for the wrongful death of a "person", rather than "minor child", and that a child conceived but not yet born is defined as an "existing person" under the law, so far as may be necessary for its interest in the event of its subsequent birth. The Supreme Court noted that "live" birth is not statutorily required. The Supreme Court also held that each case must be considered carefully to determine if the circumstances make it "necessary" for the fetus to be determined to be a person in order to protect some interest. Strzelczyk v. Jett, 264 M 153, 870 P2d 730, 51 St. Rep. 206 (1994).

Case Notes

No Attorney Appointed in Estate-Related Proceeding — Minors' Interests Amply Protected: Section 91-4316, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed), imposed on the court the responsibility to look after the interests of minors. In a proceeding for the sale of realty brought by the administrator, the interests of the adults were the same as those of the minor heirs. The court might reasonably conclude that the interests of the heirs were amply protected by their adult sisters and that the additional expense of appointing an attorney to represent the minor heirs was unwarranted. That decision was in the court's sound discretion, and the fact that no attorney was appointed did not affect the validity of the proceedings. Haugan v. Yale Oil Corp., 124 M 1, 217 P2d 1084 (1950), following State ex rel. Hamilton v. District Court, 102 M 341, 57 P2d 1227 (1936), and State ex rel. Cotter v. District Court, 34 M 306, 87 P 615 (1906).

Infant Not to Appear Without Guardian: Sections 93-2805 and 93-2806, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed), provided that an infant must appear in an action either by his general guardian or by a guardian ad litem appointed by the court. An infant defendant without a general guardian cannot appear until a guardian is appointed. Here, where a default judgment was taken against infant defendant, he could not be held responsible for his counsel's inadvertent failure to appear after consultation with his father prior to the appointment of a guardian. Maloney v. Schandelmier, 65 M 531, 212 P 493 (1923).

Appearance by General Guardian: At common law an infant plaintiff sues by guardian ad litem, but under statutes of this state he appears by his general guardian or his guardian ad litem. Melzner v. N. Pac. Ry., 46 M 162, 127 P 146 (1912); Flaherty v. Butte Elec. Ry., 40 M 454, 107 P 416 (1910).

Emancipation as Not Removing Minority: The emancipation of a minor by his parents does not render him capable of suing without a guardian. Where the complaint showed the plaintiff to be a minor, it was not subject to demurrer (demurrer abolished, former Rule 7(c), M.R.Civ.P. (now superseded), and 25-31-503, now repealed) because of a plaintiff's want of capacity to sue. A guardian should be appointed and his name inserted. Hoskins v. White, 13 M 70, 32 P 163 (1893).

Agency — Parents' Neglect to Give Notice Not Imputable to Child — Child Incapable of Appointing Agent: Neglect of parents of injured child to give 60-day notice under section 11-1305, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed), may not be imputed to the child, and since, under this section, a child is incapable of appointing an agent for any purpose, it is questionable whether the statute can be complied with in that respect by anyone as agent. Child's cause of action for personal injuries is a property right over which a parent has no control. Lazich v. Belanger, 111 M 48, 105 P2d 738 (1940).

Workers' Compensation — Disaffirmation of Settlement Agreement by Minor: A minor was injured while working and filed for workers' compensation benefits. He subsequently signed a settlement agreement after negotiating with a claims adjuster. The claimant's filing of a petition to reopen his claim resulted in a hearing and the conclusion that the case was closed. The claimant appealed, based on his minority status at the time of the settlement and his concomitant right to disaffirm contracts. The Supreme Court held that the close relationship and continuing awareness of the claimant's mother during the claims negotiations were of no avail to the defendants because only the minor claimant had signed the settlement. The defendants should have required the claimant's legal guardian to sign as well as the claimant. Accordingly, the final compromise settlement was set aside. Parrent v. Midway Toyota, 192 M 118, 626 P2d 848, 38 St. Rep. 559 (1981).

No Form Prescribed: A minor who had purchased an automobile on time redelivered it to the seller in substantially the same condition and waived any claim for the amount paid on the purchase price. He notified the seller of his intention to disaffirm the contract in two notes. No particular form of disaffirmance is prescribed by law. The unequivocal acts on the minor's part by which his intentions were made known to the seller were sufficient. Stanhope v. Shambow, 54 M 360, 170 P 752 (1918).

Contract for Conveyance Upon Majority: The defendants purchased a tract of land from the plaintiff when he was a minor, taking a written obligation from him that he would execute a deed to them when he became of age. The obligation stated that he would execute the deed in consideration of $150 paid to him. The consideration, however, was paid to his father, from whom defendants received a written guaranty that the son would execute said deed when he became of age. Plaintiff upon reaching majority disaffirmed the contract. He was not required to restore the consideration or give notice of disaffirmance prior to the beginning of the suit, as the suit itself was sufficient notice of disaffirmance. Clark v. Tate, 7 M 171, 14 P 761 (1887).

Restoration of Consideration:

Minor may disaffirm contract without restoring consideration to other party when, from the very nature of the consideration, it cannot be returned (as in case of services performed by attorneys under contract of employment to institute an action). Downey v. N. Pac. Ry., 72 M 166, 232 P 531 (1924).

1995 Amendment: Chapter 458 in (1), after "The court", deleted "after the dispositional hearing provided for in 41-3-406" and after "older" inserted "the youth's parent, or the department"; in (2)(g) inserted "if it is considered necessary by the court"; deleted former (5) regarding provision of funds by Department to finance transition to limited emancipation status (see 1995 Session Law for text); in (5), after "motion of", inserted "the county attorney or"; deleted former (6)(b) that read: "(b) the youth is failing to diligently pursue graduation from high school"; deleted (6)(e) that read: "(e) the youth has discontinued periodic counseling with approved advisors"; deleted (7) that read: "(7) The department shall mail a copy of this part to all high school counseling offices"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 14, 1995.

1991 Amendment: In (5), near beginning after "If", deleted "no order for contribution is made under 41-3-1124 and". Amendment effective July 1, 1991.

Case Notes

Limited Emancipation Decisions Not Subject to Appellate Mediation Requirements: Former Rule 54, M.R.App.P. (now superseded), provided that certain domestic relations cases are subject to appellate mediation, but those cases do not include limited emancipation decisions, which are more akin to severing parental rights than to delineating how, when, and under what circumstances parental rights may be exercised. Thus, limited emancipation actions are not subject to appellate mediation requirements. In re Emancipation of Dammarell, 2000 MT 46, 298 M 391, 3 P3d 597, 57 St. Rep. 230 (2000).

CASES PRIOR TO 1993 ACT

Immunity of Employer Under Workers' Compensation Act: When a 13 year-old girl, unlawfully employed as operator of a passenger elevator, was killed in the performance of her duties and had failed to serve upon the employer a written notice of her election not to be bound by Workers' Compensation Act, she being an "employee" under 39-71-118 expressly including minors "whether lawfully or unlawfully employed", it was held that her insured employer was immune from common-law or statutory suits for damages brought by her mother as administratrix. Tarrant v. Helena Bldg. & Realty Co., 116 M 319, 156 P2d 168 (1944).

Defenses Not Available: In an action such as this the defenses of contributory negligence and assumption of risk are not available. Daly v. Swift & Co., 90 M 52, 300 P 265 (1931), distinguished in Shaw v. Kendall, 114 M 323, 136 P2d 748 (1943).

Knowledge: Since a corporate defendant in an action based on a violation of the Child Labor Law can only have vicarious knowledge of any fact, the knowledge of its managing officers that a minor of the prohibited age was being employed in a proscribed labor constitutes the knowledge required by the act. Daly v. Swift & Co., 90 M 52, 300 P 265 (1931).

Negligence Per Se: Violation of the child labor law is negligence per se. Daly v. Swift & Co., 90 M 52, 300 P 265 (1931).

Responsibility for Independent Contractor: The fact that a boy under the age of 16 years was employed by an independent contractor in making repairs on a freight elevator when injured was immaterial, it having been defendant company's duty, being in full possession of the building and elevator and with knowledge that he was engaged in forbidden labor, to see to it that he was not permitted to continue therein. Daly v. Swift & Co., 90 M 52, 300 P 265 (1931).

What Constitutes Cause of Action: Complaint in an action to recover damages for the death of a boy under the age of 12 years alleging, inter alia, that defendant company knowingly and negligently permitted the boy to be employed by an independent contractor in and about heavy elevator machinery while being moved, contrary to the provisions of the child labor law, it was held not open to the objection that it did not state a cause of action in that it showed on its face that deceased was not in the employ of defendant but that of the contractor. Daly v. Swift & Co., 90 M 52, 300 P 265 (1931).

Invalidity of Act as to Dangerous Occupations Not Specifically Enumerated: When the Legislature undertakes to define a new offense, the statute must be so explicit that all persons subject to its penalty may know what acts to avoid, and under that rule the provision of 41-2-101 (now repealed) making it a misdemeanor to employ a child under the age of 16 years "in any occupation ... known to be dangerous" is so uncertain as to the kind and nature of occupations intended to come within the prohibited class as to render it void. Burk v. Mont. Power Co., 79 M 52, 255 P 337 (1927), distinguished in Shaw v. Kendall, 114 M 323, 136 P2d 748 (1943).

Requisites of Complaint for Damages: The complaint in an action by a minor against a railway company to recover damages for personal injuries, making it negligence per se for an employer to hire a child under 16, must allege that defendant employed plaintiff knowing him to have been under that age. Fallon v. Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Ry., 61 M 130, 200 P 453 (1921).

CHILD ABUSE AND NEGLECT

Chapter Compiler's Comments

Preamble: The preamble to SB 301 (Ch. 543, L. 1979) provided: "WHEREAS, Governor Judge appointed a task force to recommend ways in which services to families in which abuse and neglect are occurring could be improved; and

WHEREAS, the task force recognizes that the most crucial actions toward improving services to families must be taken by the local community; and

WHEREAS, the task force recognizes that child abuse and neglect is a multifaceted problem and that no one agency or discipline, by itself, has the resources or perspective to resolve or contain the problem; and

WHEREAS, the task force has heard testimony from numerous individuals, legislative staff, and other persons who deal with abused and neglected children and their families; and

WHEREAS, existing child abuse and neglect laws do not meet requirements allowing Montana to qualify for federal grants under Public Law 93-247.

THEREFORE, it is the intent of this bill to address the problems facing the children, families, and communities of this state regarding child abuse and neglect."

Chapter Case Notes

Termination of Parental Rights — Requirements of Indian Child Welfare Act: Under the Indian Child Welfare Act, 25 U.S.C. 1901, et seq., the party seeking termination of an individual's parental rights to an Indian child under state law must satisfy the court that active efforts have been made to provide remedial services and rehabilitative programs designed to prevent the breakup of the Indian family and that the efforts have proved unsuccessful. The party seeking termination has the burden of proving beyond a reasonable doubt that the continued custody of the child by the parent or Indian custodian is likely to result in serious emotional or physical damage to the child. In re Custody of A.L.R., A.A.R., & T.C.R., 2002 MT 183, 311 M 76, 54 P3d 17 (2002). See also In re I.B., 2011 MT 82, 360 Mont. 132, 255 P.3d 56.

No Authority to Grant Third-Party Petition for Parenting Plan Absent Termination of Parental Rights: A young, single mother left her child in the temporary care of the Knopps, her aunt and uncle, while she sought employment and a place to live. About 2 months after the child was left with them, the Knopps petitioned for a parenting plan and support for the child. Although the document was referred to as a petition for a parenting plan, child support, and medical support, it was the functional equivalent of a petition for permanent custody. The Knopps applied for temporary custody and received it, ex parte, so that when the mother returned and tried to remove the child to their new home, she was not allowed to do so. The mother then sought termination of the guardianship and the return of her child. The mother's parental rights were never terminated or suspended by the state or county, nor were any proceedings ever commenced to demonstrate that the child was abused, dependent, or neglected. The District Court dismissed the petition, relying on In re Guardianship of D.T.N., 275 M 480, 914 P2d 579 (1996), in holding that the mother had a constitutional right to custody of her child and that permanent guardianship could not be granted because the mother's parental rights had not been terminated or suspended. The Knopps appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. The rule of law does not permit destruction of a natural parent's fundamental right to the custody of a child based simply on the subjective determination of the child's best interests. Rather, a natural parent cannot be denied custody of a child absent termination of parental rights for abuse or neglect pursuant to this chapter. In re Parenting of J.N.P., 2001 MT 120, 305 M 351, 27 P3d 953 (2001). See also In re A.R.A., 276 M 66, 919 P2d 388 (1996), and Girard v. Williams, 1998 MT 231, 291 M 49, 966 P2d 1155 (1998).

Best Interest of Child Standard Unconstitutional in Custody Award to Nonparent Over Natural Parent Absent Finding of Abuse, Neglect, or Dependency: The best interest of the child standard incorporated into 40-4-221 in determining the custody of a child whose custodial parent dies is unconstitutional to the extent that it allows the grant of a petition prior to the termination of the noncustodial parent's constitutional right to custody. Use of the standard is improper in that any showing that a nonparent may be able to provide a better environment than a natural parent is irrelevant to the question of custody between the two in view of the constitutional right of a parent to custody. Although 40-4-221 gives a nonparent standing to request a custody hearing, it does not give the District Court authority to deprive a natural parent of the right to custody absent a finding of abuse, neglect, or dependency on the part of the natural parent. In re A.R.A., 276 M 66, 919 P2d 388, 53 St. Rep. 543 (1996), following In re Doney, 174 M 282, 570 P2d 575 (1977), and overruling Brost v. Glasgow, 200 M 194, 651 P2d 32 (1982), and In re C.G., 228 M 118, 740 P2d 1139 (1987).

Indian Child Welfare Act — Burden of Proof for Placement in Foster Care: D.F and L.F., natural children of appellant who is an enrolled member of the Three Affiliated Tribes, were taken from appellant and placed in a foster home by the Department of Family Services (now Department of Health and Human Services). The Supreme Court found that the District Court had properly applied the standard of the Indian Child Welfare Act of 1978 requiring "clear and convincing" evidence that continued custody by appellant was likely to result in emotional or physical harm to her children and that clear and convincing evidence was shown to the District Court. All of the expert witnesses who testified gave examples of actions by appellant or her live-in male roommate that endangered the psychological or physical well-being of the children. Therefore, even though the District Court did not specifically state the burden of proof, the proof required by 25 U.S.C. 1912(e) was satisfied. In re L.F. & D.F., 266 M 461, 880 P2d 1365, 51 St. Rep. 900 (1994), cited in In re G.S., 2002 MT 245, 312 M 108, 59 P3d 1063 (2002), in which the Supreme Court upheld the District Court, concluding that the District Court applied the "clear and convincing evidence" standard in ruling that the state agency employed active, yet unsuccessful, efforts to provide remedial and rehabilitative services designed to prevent the breakup of an Indian family prior to granting the state agency temporary custody of the Indian children.

Marriage and Divorce Law Inapplicable to Nonparent Seeking Child Custody: As part of a change in custody proceeding conducted under the marriage and divorce statutes, the District Court erred in granting to a nonparent the custody of a child who was neither a natural child nor adopted. The proper procedure to be followed is contained in the child abuse, neglect, and dependency statutes. Although the nonparent apparently fit the requirements for custodian under either scenario, the case was remanded for correct procedural consideration under this chapter. In re Marriage of Miller, 251 M 300, 825 P2d 189, 49 St. Rep. 36 (1992), following In re Doney, 174 M 282, 570 P2d 575 (1977), and overruling a contrary prior holding in In re Custody of C.C., K.C., & B.C., 215 M 72, 695 P2d 816 (1985).

Exclusion of Evidence on Child Abuse Proceeding Concerning Father — Harmless Error: It was harmless error, in a child custody modification proceeding, for a District Court judge to exclude evidence that a petition for temporary investigative authority (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427), alleging sexual abuse by the father, had been filed under Title 41, ch. 3, and dismissed for lack of evidence after being heard by the same judge who made the custody modification determination. In re Marriage of Stout, 216 M 342, 701 P2d 729, 42 St. Rep. 856 (1985).

No Requirement for Determination on Exact Cause and Nature of Child's Problems: Title 41, ch. 3, does not require a determination of the exact nature and cause of a child's problems before reaching a proper decision. When the trial court's findings were supported by substantial and credible evidence after a thorough and intense examination of all factors presented, the mother cannot prevail under the theory that the evidence did not support the court's findings that her child was a youth in need of care or under the contention that, at most, the nature and cause of her child's problems could not be determined. In re B.L.O., 213 M 164, 689 P2d 1246, 41 St. Rep. 2024 (1984).

Dependent and Neglected Finding Invalid When Entered in Guardianship Proceeding: A District Court finding that children were dependent and neglected was invalid since it was rendered in a guardianship proceeding instituted by the paternal grandparents rather than in a proceeding instituted to have the children declared dependent and neglected, as it must be, by the County Attorney under Title 41, ch. 3. In re Guardianship of Aschenbrenner, 182 M 540, 597 P2d 1156 (1979). However, see also In re L.E.B., 259 M 492, 856 P2d 1382, 50 St. Rep. 895 (1993), in which Aschenbrenner was distinguished in a case brought under adoption proceedings rather than guardianship proceedings.

Procedures to Be Rigorously Followed: While there is some overlap in the various statutory schemes governing the termination of parental rights and the custody of children as to general subject matter, each is used for a distinct purpose and sets forth specific procedures which must be rigorously followed before a valid judgment or order may be issued, to insure that the minors involved receive the full protection of these laws. In re Guardianship of Aschenbrenner, 182 M 540, 597 P2d 1156 (1979).

Termination of Parental Rights: The State may not terminate a parent's right to raise his or her own child merely because a court or state agency feels that a nonparent has more financial resources or pursues a preferable lifestyle. In re Inquiry into J.L.B., Youth in Need of Care, 182 M 100, 594 P2d 1127 (1979).

Names of Parties: The Supreme Court directed that in this and in future cases under 41-3-101, et seq., in both the District and Supreme Courts, all names of parties involved be removed to avoid publicity of the minor parties involved. In re Gore, Youth in Need of Care, 174 M 321, 570 P2d 1110 (1977).

Case Notes

Parent in Long-Term Federal Incarceration Unable to Comply With Treatment Plan — Termination of Parental Rights Affirmed: The District Court terminated the parental rights of a father who was incarcerated in federal prison for a long-term sentence. The father asserted that the District Court erred in terminating his parental rights because it was not in the children's best interests and that the court should have allowed the children to continue their relationship with their loving, but temporarily absent, father. The Supreme Court disagreed. The best interests of the child are of paramount importance and take precedence over parental rights, and the need for permanent placement of children in a loving and stable home supersedes the parents' interests. The District Court kept informed about the children's placements and placement failures and made arrangements for their placement in a stable home. Given the fact that the father's long-term incarceration would not provide the opportunity for adequate parenting, and the father's failure to comply with a court-ordered parenting plan, the District Court did not abuse its discretion by terminating the father's parental rights and placing the children in permanent foster care. In re B.S. & G.S., 2009 MT 98, 350 M 86, 206 P3d 565 (2009).

Termination Hearing Held Wrong Time to Consider Placement With Grandparents — Failure of Other State to Accept Jurisdiction: When parents of a child whom the husband had abused opposed termination of parental rights at the termination hearing by alleging that the Department of Public Health and Human Services should have sought placement with the grandparents pursuant to this section, the District Court held that the termination hearing was the wrong time to adjudicate a placement of the children with the grandparents. The Supreme Court upheld the District Court, noting that the Department had inquired into such a placement with its counterpart state agency in North Carolina, where the grandparents lived, but after interviewing the grandmother, the North Carolina state agency refused to consider the placement and thereby declined to accept jurisdiction over the children. In re O.A.W., 2007 MT 13, 335 M 304, 153 P3d 6 (2007).

Liability of Parent for Child's Injury to Third Person Based on Parent's Failure to Exercise Reasonable Care of Child — Restatement of Torts as Reasonable Expression of Parent's Duty — Kienenberger Reversed: Crisafulli attended an auction conducted by Bass's auction company and was injured when Bass's son rode a bicycle through the crowd of spectators while handling auction tickets and hit Crisafulli. The District Court applied J.L. v. Kienenberger, 257 M 113, 848 P2d 472 (1993), granting summary judgment to Bass on grounds that parents have no independent duty to control the behavior of their children. Crisafulli contended that Kienenberger was distinguishable and that the District Court should instead have followed Restatement (Second) of Torts 316 (1965). That section of the Restatement does not make a parent liable for the torts of a child, but imposes liability on the parent for the parent's own failure to exercise a duty of reasonable care, then narrowly defines the circumstances under which that duty arises by requiring that the parent knows of the ability to control the child and understands the necessity for doing so, and then further conditions liability on a finding that the parent's failure created an unreasonable risk of harm to a third person. The Supreme Court concluded that imposition of liability under these limited and exceptional circumstances, in the absence of any legislative policy to the contrary, was a reasonable expression of a parent's duty in Montana and adopted the Restatement, overruling Kienenberger to the extent that it was inconsistent. The District Court's order granting summary judgment to Bass on the issue was reversed. Crisafulli v. Bass, 2001 MT 316, 308 M 40, 38 P3d 842 (2001). See also Mitchell v. Wiltfong, 604 P2d 79 (Kans. Ct. App. 1979).

Appropriateness of Treatment Plan Requirement That Parents Provide Explanation of Child's Injuries: Four treatment plans were developed with the parents, the purpose of all of which was to: (1) return the child to parental custody; (2) enable the parents to provide a safe and nurturing environment for the child; (3) enable the parents to develop an awareness of the child's needs and an ability to meet those needs; (4) help the parents develop minimal parenting skills; and (5) resolve the issues that led to the child's abuse, which included a requirement that the parents provide a reasonable and consistent explanation for the child's injuries. The parents were subsequently convicted of endangering the welfare of the child, and the state petitioned for custody. Prior to the permanent custody hearing, the mother moved to strike the task that required an explanation of the child's injuries, but the state never filed a brief in response to the motion. Nevertheless, the motion was denied. Following the termination of the mother's parental rights, she challenged the appropriateness of that task on grounds that the task placed her in the untenable position of having to choose between incriminating herself and failing to complete the treatment plan, in violation of her right against self-incrimination, relying on In re A.N., 2000 MT 35, 298 M 237, 995 P2d 427 (2000). The Supreme Court found her reliance on In re A.N. misplaced. The mother waived her self-incrimination privileges by voluntarily testifying regarding her knowledge of the child's injuries at both the permanent custody hearing and during the criminal proceeding and could not argue later that the disputed task impinged on her constitutional privilege against self-incrimination. Further, the state's duty to protect children, as set out in this section, necessitated that the parents come to terms with the reasons why the child was abused, and without demonstrable willingness from the parents to resolve the abuse issues, the District Court had no assurance that the child would not be abused again. Thus, the task was a fair requirement in the treatment plan, and the District Court did not err in concluding that the plan was appropriate or in denying the motion to strike the task from the plan. Denying the motion was within the court's discretion regardless of whether the state filed a brief in response to the motion. In re A.C., 2001 MT 126, 305 M 404, 27 P3d 960 (2001).

No Duty to Third Party: This section describes a duty parents owe to their children, not to third parties. The rule in Montana is that a parent is not liable for a child's tort except as provided in 27-1-718 and 40-6-237. J.L. v. Kienenberger, 257 M 113, 848 P2d 472, 50 St. Rep. 182 (1993), overruled in Crisafulli v. Bass, 2001 MT 316, 308 M 40, 38 P3d 842 (2001), to the extent that Restatement (Second) of Torts 316 (1965) is adopted as a reasonable expression of a parent's duty in Montana, imposing liability on a parent, not for the torts of a child, but for the parent's own failure to exercise reasonable care.

County Properly Dismissed From Suit — State Assumption of Responsibility: A county was properly dismissed from a civil rights action brought by father whose children were removed from the state by social workers because the county retained no enforcement authority under an agreement with the state whereby the state assumed all responsibility for enforcement of the dependent and neglected child statutes. Caldwell v. LeFaver, 928 F2d 331 (9th Cir. 1991).

Qualified Immunity of Department Social Workers in Removing Children to Out-of-State Placement: Social workers who removed minor children from father's home without notice or hearing and arranged for them to stay in another state with their mother, who had joint custody, were not entitled to absolute immunity in father's civil rights action because their actions were neither quasi-prosecutorial nor quasi-judicial in nature. However, the social workers were entitled to qualified immunity because of the emergency nature of their actions and because they did not violate any clearly established constitutional or statutory right. Caldwell v. LeFaver, 928 F2d 331 (9th Cir. 1991).

Preservation of Family Unity as Long-Term Goal — Temporary Out-of-State Custody in Furtherance of Goal: The trial court satisfied the policy to preserve family life set forth in this section (see 1995 amendment) even though temporary custody was awarded the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) for treatment of the child outside of Montana. The trial court made its determination after considering all factors and adopted a treatment plan with ultimate goals of assisting the mother in working to regain physical custody of her child and aiding her in establishing herself as capable of providing the type and quality of care that her child requires. In re B.L.O., 213 M 164, 689 P2d 1246, 41 St. Rep. 2024 (1984).

Abuse and Neglect — Custody With Intervening Divorce: Where a couple voluntarily surrendered their child to the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) because of abuse and neglect by the mother, the District Court was correct in continuing with the abuse and neglect custody proceeding rather than dismissing it and allowing custody to be determined in the couple's divorce action. Once a determination of abuse and neglect has been made, the court proceeds to a dispositional hearing to determine the custody of the child. In re M.M., 200 M 244, 650 P2d 784, 39 St. Rep. 1716 (1982).

Family Unity Not to Be Preserved at Expense of Children's Best Interests: After an adjudicatory hearing, the District Court terminated the parental rights of the parents of five children and granted custody with authority to consent to adoption to the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services). Under Department placement, the children would be separated from each other. The paternal grandmother appealed to the Supreme Court, claiming that the state policy of preserving the unity and welfare of the family as set forth in this section was violated by the separation of the children and by the District Court's refusal to award the children to her. The Supreme Court affirmed because the District Court's findings indicated that it had considered the grandmother's request but that the overriding concern was and ought to have been the best interests of the children. In re M.N., 199 M 407, 649 P2d 749, 39 St. Rep. 1487 (1982).

Protection of Family Unit: Although it is the function of the court to protect the unity of the family, family unity was not a factor when the child's only known natural parent had been confined to a state hospital and the child had been placed in a foster home since birth. The child had never had a viable parent-child relationship with her mother and had never seen or been associated with her natural mother. In re C.M.S., A Dependent and Neglected Child, 187 M 115, 609 P2d 240 (1979).

Voluntary Statements Made to Civilians in Criminal Case — No Invasion of Privacy: On two occasions while the defendant and his stepson were alone, the stepson received serious injuries. On both occasions the defendant made statements to his wife and to several doctors explaining how the injuries occurred. The defendant was charged with aggravated assault and filed a motion to suppress his statements. The defendant contended that the statements violated his right of privacy guaranteed by the Montana Constitution. The court found that there was no element of surreptitious obtaining of the information. Additionally, constitutional provisions on right of privacy permit its invasion upon a showing of a compelling state interest. That compelling state interest is clearly shown in child abuse cases by the declaration of policy contained in 41-3-101. St. v. Hall, 183 M 511, 600 P2d 1180 (1979).

Termination of Parental Rights: When the following things were considered, the record supported the conclusion that the father's rights were adequately considered prior to termination of parental rights and that the decision to terminate them was supported by credible evidence: (1) the father was notified of the hearing, was present, and was represented by counsel; (2) professional testimony indicated the father would not be able to provide enough influence to offset the marked deprivation anticipated to continue for the child; (3) the father was found to have made no effort to assist the mother in learning to become a good parent; (4) the father had visited the child only once in 6 months when the child was in a foster home and had been reported to have abused the child. In re L.F.G., 183 M 239, 598 P2d 1125 (1979).

Youth in Need — Best Interest of Child — Mental Condition of Parent as Sole Factor: When the District Court considered the best interests of a child only after first determining that the child was in fact abused or neglected, it met the required standard. Considering the mental condition of the mother as the primary if not the sole factor, but having evidence that the child would not receive even minimally satisfactory maternal care and would be exposed to extremely high chances of developing a mental condition similar to that of the mother, sufficient credible evidence was before the District Court to support the District Court's decision that the child was a youth in need of care. The Supreme Court rejected the view that mental condition of a parent could not be the sole factor supporting a severance of parental rights. In re L.F.G., 183 M 239, 598 P2d 1125 (1979).

Grounds for Removal From Parents: Under 41-3-102, abuse or neglect can take many forms, some violent, others more passive but just as injurious. The court cannot hold the children hostage while awaiting the good behavior of the parents. It must protect the children's rights as well as the parents. In re T.Y.K., 183 M 91, 598 P2d 593 (1979).

Protection of All Children When Abuse of One Less Than Another: A parent does not have the privilege of inflicting brutal treatment upon each of his children in succession before they individually obtain the protection of the state by virtue of 41-3-101. Section 41-3-101, et seq., grants to the District Court the ability to make a determination of neglect and abuse as to all children in a family based on the policy that abuse of one child has a detrimental effect on the other children's development. In re T.Y.K., 183 M 91, 598 P2d 593 (1979), followed in In re B.T., B.T., M.T., & M.T., 223 M 287, 725 P2d 230, 43 St. Rep. 1728 (1986), In re T.C. & R.C., 240 M 308, 784 P2d 392, 46 St. Rep. 2148 (1989), In re J.A.B., 1999 MT 173, 295 M 227, 983 P2d 387, 56 St. Rep. 675 (1999), and In re M.B., J.B., & W.B., 2004 MT 304, 323 M 468, 100 P3d 1006 (2004).

Preservation of Family Unity: When proof shows a minor child is neglected, it is not possible to preserve family unity. It is when there is a failure of proof that the legislative policy to preserve the unity and welfare of the family must prevail. (See 1995 amendment.) Therefore, the judgment of the District Court awarding permanent custody to the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) was proper. Family unity need not be preserved at the expense of a child's best interests. In re Inquiry Into J.J.S., Youth in Need of Care, 176 M 202, 577 P2d 378 (1978).

Insufficient Evidence to Overcome Policy to Preserve Family: Mother's failure to find suitable housing and a decent job after death of father is insufficient adversity to dissolve the family absent a concrete showing that it would be in the best interest of the children. It was a clear abuse of discretion by District Court to award permanent custody to Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Public and Human Services) because policy of the State of Montana as declared by the Legislature is to preserve the unity and welfare of the family whenever possible. (See 1995 amendment.) Div. of Child Welfare Serv. v. Fisher, 169 M 254, 545 P2d 654 (1976).

Attorney General's Opinions

Balance of Competing State Interests in Prevention and Reporting of Child Abuse — Abrogation of Communication Privileges by Statute: Although the state has competing interests in the prevention of child abuse and neglect and in protecting the communication privileges between physicians or mental health practitioners and their patients, the communication privilege is abrogated under 41-3-201 in cases where the professional obtains the information as a result of his treatment of the child. 42 A.G. Op. 7 (1987).

County Power — "4-C's": Counties, jointly with the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services), may contract with local "4-C's" projects to provide coordination and support of child abuse prevention and treatment services. 37 A.G. Op. 105 (1978).

Chapter 277 in definition of abandon, abandoned, and abandonment inserted (d) regarding voluntary surrender of newborn to emergency services provider; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 2001.

Chapter 311 inserted definitions of concurrent planning, family group conference, permanent placement, and physical neglect; at end of definition of youth in need of care inserted "or abandoned"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2001.

Applicability: Section 8, Ch. 194, L. 2001, provided: "[This act] applies to proceedings on petitions filed pursuant to 41-3-401 [now 41-3-422] after October 1, 2001."

1999 Amendment: Chapter 566 inserted definition of abandon, abandoned, and abandonment; in definition of best interests of the child substituted "psychological conditions" for "emotional conditions"; in definition of child abuse or neglect in (a)(i) before "harm" inserted "actual", in (a)(ii) substituted "substantial risk of harm" for "threatened harm", and in (b) substituted "actual harm or substantial risk of harm" for "harm or threatened harm to a child's health or welfare"; deleted definition of emotional abuse that read: ""Emotional abuse" means injury to the emotional well-being or intellectual or psychological capacity of a child, as evidenced by an identifiable and substantial impairment of a child's physical, mental, or emotional ability to function"; in definition of harm to a child's health or welfare in (a) substituted "psychological abuse or neglect" for "emotional abuse", in (f) after "abandons the child" deleted "by leaving the child under circumstances that make reasonable the belief that the parent or other person does not intend to resume care of the child in the future or willfully surrenders physical custody for a period of 6 months and during that period does not manifest to the child and the person having physical custody of the child a firm intention to resume physical custody or to make permanent legal arrangements for the care of the child", and deleted former (g) that read: "(g) is unknown and has been unknown for a period of 90 days and reasonable efforts to identify and locate the parent or other person have failed"; in definition of limited emancipation after "court" deleted "after a dispositional hearing"; in definition of physical abuse after "means" inserted "an intentional act, an intentional omission, or gross negligence resulting in", before "burns" deleted "intentional", and after "death" deleted "if the injury or death is not accidental"; inserted definition of psychological abuse or neglect; in definition of sexual abuse inserted "sexual abuse, ritual abuse" and at end after "chapter 5" deleted "part 5"; in definition of social worker after "trained" deleted "or is receiving education or training"; deleted definition of threatened harm to a child's health or welfare that read: ""Threatened harm to a child's health or welfare" means substantial risk of harm to the child's health or welfare"; inserted definition of unfounded; in definition of youth in need of care substituted "who has been adjudicated or determined, after a hearing, to be or to have been abused or neglected" for "who is abused or neglected"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 1999.

1997 Amendments: Chapter 514 at end of definition of a person responsible for a child's welfare inserted "or an adult who resides in the same home in which the child resides"; in definition of adequate health care, in first sentence of (a), inserted "or nonmedical remedial health care recognized by an insurer licensed to provide disability insurance under Title 33" and in first sentence of (b) inserted "or legal guardian" and substituted "adequate health" for "medical"; inserted definition of emotional abuse; in definition of harm to a child's health or welfare, in (d) near beginning, inserted "malnutrition" and inserted (e) providing "exposes or allows the child to be exposed to an unreasonable risk to the child's health or welfare by failing to intervene or eliminate the risk"; deleted definition of mental injury that read: ""Mental injury" means an identifiable and substantial impairment of the child's intellectual or psychological functioning"; in definition of parent, at end, deleted "or stepparent"; substituted physical abuse for physical injury as defined term, in the definition substituted "substantial skin bruising, internal bleeding, substantial injury to skin, subdural hematoma, intentional burns, bone fractures, extreme pain" for "death", at end inserted "or death if the injury or death is not accidental", and deleted sentence that read: "The term includes death, permanent or temporary disfigurement, and impairment of a bodily organ or function sustained as a result of excessive corporal punishment"; inserted definitions of reasonable cause to suspect and residential setting; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective May 2, 1997.

Chapter 516 in definition of a person responsible for a child's welfare, at end of (a) after "foster parent", inserted "or an adult who resides in the same home in which the child resides"; in definition of adequate health care, in first sentence of (b) after "parent", inserted "or guardian", and in second sentence, after "imminent", deleted "or" and after "risk of" inserted "serious"; inserted definition of best interests of the child; in definition of harm to a child's health or welfare, in (g) after "locate the", substituted "parent or other person" for "parents"; inserted definition of parent-child legal relationship; in definition of sexual abuse, at end of (b) after "parent", inserted "or other person responsible for the child's welfare"; inserted definition of treatment plan; adjusted subsection references; and made minor changes in style.

Coordination: Section 19(1), Ch. 516, L. 1997, provided: "If House Bill No. 163 is passed and approved and if 40-8-109 and 40-8-117 are repealed, a reference to [sections 1 through 156 of House Bill No. 163] [codified as Title 42], the "Montana Adoption Act", should be substituted for the reference to "40-8-109, 40-8-117" in 41-3-102 under the definition of "parent-child legal relationship"." House Bill No. 163 was approved as Ch. 480, L. 1997, and included the repeal of 40-8-109 and 40-8-117; therefore, the references to 40-8-109 and 40-8-117 in 41-3-102 under the definition of parent-child legal relationship have been changed to reflect the enactment of Ch. 480.

Applicability: Section 20, Ch. 516, L. 1997, provided that this section applies to proceedings commenced on or after October 1, 1997.

1995 Amendments: Chapter 458 deleted definition of dependent youth (see 1995 Session Law for text); in definition of limited emancipation, after "conferred on a", deleted "dependent"; inserted definition of parent; in definition of youth in need of care, after "who is", deleted "dependent"; adjusted subsection references; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 14, 1995.

Chapter 528 in definition of child abuse or neglect inserted (c) exempting self-defense, defense of others, or action taken to prevent a child from self-harm; and made minor changes in style.

Chapter 546 in definition of Department substituted "department of public health and human services provided for in 2-15-2201" for "department of family services provided for in 2-15-2401"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1995.

Chapter 564 in definition of child abuse or neglect, in (a)(i) after "welfare", deleted "as defined in subsection (8)" and in (a)(ii), after "welfare", deleted "as defined in subsection (15)"; in definition of harm to a child's health or welfare inserted (c) expanding definition to include person who induces or attempts to induce child into giving untrue testimony of abuse or neglect by parent or responsible person; in definition of sexual abuse inserted (b) providing that sexual abuse does not include necessary touching of infant or toddler while attending to sanitary or health care needs; in definition of social worker, after "department", substituted current definition of social worker for ""Social worker" means an employee of the department whose duties generally involve the provision of either child or adult protective services, or both"; and made minor changes in style.

Saving Clause: Section 571, Ch. 546, L. 1995, was a saving clause.

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 564, L. 1995, provided: "WHEREAS, the Legislature finds it necessary to restore public confidence in the child protective system and to provide protection of individual and family civil rights as guaranteed by the state and federal constitutions."

1993 Amendment: Chapter 439 substituted present definition of abused or neglected for former definition that read: ""Abused or neglected child" means a child whose normal physical or mental health or welfare is harmed or threatened with harm by the acts or omissions of his parent or other person responsible for his welfare"; in (a) of definition of adequate health care, near beginning after "medical", deleted "or nonmedical remedial health" and inserted (b) regarding failure to provide medical care for a child based on religious beliefs; inserted definition of child abuse or neglect; near middle of (c) of definition of harm to a child's health or welfare, before "health", inserted "adequate"; and made minor changes in style.

1989 Amendment: In definition of harm to a child's health or welfare, in (a) after "injury", deleted "including injuries sustained as a result of excessive corporal punishment" and in (b), after "committed", substituted "sexual abuse or exploitation of the child" for "a sexual assault against the child or exploits the child or allows the child to be exploited for sexual purposes or commits or allows to be committed the act of sexual abuse of children as defined in subsection (1) of 45-5-625"; substituted definition of threatened harm to a child's health or welfare for former definition that read: ""Threatened harm" means imminent risk of harm"; in definition of person responsible for a child's welfare, after "foster parent", inserted "a staff person providing care in a day-care facility"; near middle of definition of physical injury inserted "and includes death, permanent or temporary disfigurement, and impairment of a bodily organ or function sustained as a result of excessive corporal punishment"; inserted definitions of sexual abuse and sexual exploitation; and made minor changes in phraseology. Amendment effective April 8, 1989.

Effective Date — Applicability: Section 3, Ch. 474, L. 1989, provided: "[This act] is effective on passage and approval and applies to proceedings begun on or after that date." Approved April 8, 1989.

1987 Amendments: Chapter 463 in (4), after "treatment", inserted "or medically indicated psychological care".

Chapter 609 deleted former (12) that read: "(12) "Supervision" means the authority granted by a youth court or by a voluntary agreement of a parent to determine the foster care placement of a child and the length of stay of a child in foster care and provide for the needs of a child under subsection (1) of 41-3-1122"; in (12) changed definition of department from Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services to Department of Family Services and corrected internal reference; and inserted definition of social worker.

1985 Amendment: In (4) inserted "including the prevention of the withholding of medically indicated treatment"; and inserted definition of "withholding of medically indicated treatment".

Source: Chapter 626, L. 1985, was based on the federal law entitled the Child Abuse Amendments of 1984 (Public Law 98-457).

1983 Amendments: Chapter 465, in (11), changed 41-3-104 to 41-3-1122.

Chapter 564 inserted definition of limited emancipation.

1981 Amendment: Added "or commits or allows to be committed the act of sexual abuse of children as defined in subsection (1) of 45-5-625" at the end of (3)(b); added the language relating to willful surrender of custody at the end of (3)(d); inserted subsection (3)(e) relating to 90-day time period and failure to locate parents; and added definitions of supervision and department.

PROCEDURE

No Error in Finding Inapplicability of Indian Child Welfare Act to Parental Rights Termination Proceeding: At a hearing to terminate a father's parental rights, the father listed three Indian tribes that he thought either he or the children's mother was affiliated with. The District Court found that although the father was an enrolled member of one of the tribes, the children were not eligible or enrolled with that tribe. The father also asserted that he might have connections to a second tribe because of the mother's alleged membership, but in order for the Indian Child Welfare Act (ICWA) to apply, the child must be either a tribal member or eligible for tribal membership and be the biological child of a tribal member. Because the father could not assert that he was a member of the second tribe, the children could not qualify as members of the second tribe. The father also contended that there was possible heritage with a third tribe through the mother's father, but neither he nor the mother was a tribal member, so the children could not be biological children of a member of the third tribe. Additionally, any connection the children had with the third tribe through their maternal grandfather was preserved by their mother's continued custody and care. Therefore, the District Court did not err in finding that ICWA did not apply. In re J.J.L., D.J.L., and R.D.L.L., 2010 MT 4, 355 Mont. 23, 223 P.3d 921.

Children Relinquished Voluntarily — Finding That Youths in Need of Care Not Clearly Erroneous: A mother who had voluntarily relinquished her children to the state because of an inability to parent the children, even in the safety of a home for domestically abused women, contended that the District Court committed clear error in subsequently adjudicating the children as youths in need of care (YINC) because the court based its decision solely on the children's observations of domestic abuse and violence between the parents and because no psychological evaluations had been conducted on the children and no expert medical testimony was introduced at the termination hearing. The Supreme Court found no clear error on the part of the District Court. The mother cited no authority requiring psychological evaluations or expert medical testimony before a YINC adjudication. Further, the evidence of abuse or neglect necessary to support a YINC adjudication may be actual physical or psychological harm or a substantial risk of physical or psychological harm to the child by acts or omissions of a parent responsible for the child's welfare. Here, the District Court heard testimony at the initial hearing that several incidents had occurred in which the children were directly exposed to domestic abuse and that the father was incarcerated and the mother was unable to parent the children. One of the children had to be placed at a children's receiving home following removal from two foster homes for violent behavior. The mother was shown to have serious mental health issues, including anger issues, that negatively impacted the mother's parenting ability and that remained unaddressed. Under these circumstances, the District Court's conclusion that the children were YINC was affirmed. In re B.S. & G.S., 2009 MT 113, 350 M 132, 206 P3d 74 (2009).

Sufficient Evidence to Adjudicate Children as Youths in Need of Care: The District Court properly adjudicated children as youths in need of care based on evidence that: (1) there was a significant prior history of domestic violence and domestic abuse between the parents in the presence of the children; (2) one of the children exhibited various behavior and developmental problems, including running away, violent behavior, anger control problems, and poor language skills; (3) the father could not care for the children because of his long-term federal incarceration; (4) the mother, who was living at a shelter for domestic abuse victims and dealing with mental health issues, had voluntarily surrendered the children to state care because of her inability to adequately parent them; and (5) the state had made reasonable efforts to avoid placement of the children or to make it possible to safely return the children to the home, but protective placement was required. In re B.S. & G.S., 2009 MT 98, 350 M 86, 206 P3d 565 (2009).

Parent's Acquiescence in Adjudicatory Proceedings — Finding That Child Is Youth in Need of Care Based on Parent's Admissions — Stipulation Not Required: A mother contested termination of her parental rights on grounds that her child was not properly adjudicated as a youth in need of care. The mother was incarcerated at the time of the hearing and contended that although she agreed to a treatment plan, she never admitted that the child met the definition of a youth in need of care or stipulated that the child was in need of care. The Supreme Court noted that the trial court should have specifically inquired of the mother or her counsel whether the mother stipulated that the child was a youth in need of care, but it was not error for the District Court to make that finding based on the mother's own admissions that she was addicted to methamphetamine and needed treatment and that her addiction impacted the child unfairly. The mother was not placed at an unfair disadvantage during the termination proceedings and was represented by counsel at all stages. She never questioned the regularity of the proceedings until appeal. The court held that because 35 months had passed between the adjudicatory hearing and the notice of appeal, it would not be in the child's best interests to prolong the matter, particularly when much of the delay was caused by the mother's repeated relapses and her failure to put the child's interests above her desire to indulge her addiction. The adjudication was proper and did not prejudice the mother, and the District Court was affirmed. In re A.S., 2006 MT 281, 334 M 280, 146 P3d 778 (2006).

District Court Not Limited to Consideration of Only Physical Neglect in Termination of Parental Rights: The final petition for termination of a mother's parental rights specifically cited physical neglect as its basis, and the mother contended that the District Court was thus barred from considering any evidence beyond physical neglect, such as psychological abuse, as demonstrated by the living conditions in her home. The District Court did not rule on the issue, but simply made the underlying findings necessary to terminate the mother's parental rights. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Although it may have been better if the final petition had listed other grounds, it is proper for the state to consider other causes of abuse and neglect during proceedings because the purpose of the proceedings is to protect the child. The final petition also cited failure to comply with the treatment plan as another basis for termination. The treatment plan addressed the mother's psychological issues related to her parenting skills, so the mother was clearly on notice that psychological issues could be considered. Based on the record, parental rights were properly terminated because the mother failed to comply with the treatment plan, she was unable to properly and consistently parent her children by understanding and meeting each of their needs, her conduct was unlikely to change within a reasonable time relevant to the developmental needs of the children, and termination was in the best interests of the children. In re J.G., C.G., & M.G.-E., 2004 MT 104, 321 M 54, 89 P3d 11 (2004).

Failure to Adjudicate Youth in Need of Care Precluding Termination of Parental Rights: A parent contended that parental rights were improperly terminated because the child was not properly adjudicated as a youth in need of care. The Supreme Court noted that such adjudication is a threshold requirement before a court may grant temporary legal custody, order a parental treatment plan, or terminate parental rights. The state argued that the child was found to be a youth in need of care during earlier guardianship proceedings in a different District Court. The Supreme Court cited In re F.M., 2002 MT 180, 311 M 35, 53 P3d 368 (2002), for the holding that evidence received at a hearing on a collateral matter, such as a guardianship proceeding, did not satisfy the adjudicatory requirements of 41-3-404 (renumbered 41-3-437). Further, it was improper for the District Court to approve a treatment plan 10 months prior to proper adjudication of the child as a youth in need of care, in violation of 41-3-406 (renumbered 41-3-438) and 41-3-420 (renumbered 41-3-443), which also rendered the requirements of 41-3-609 unsatisfied. Because the child was not properly adjudicated a youth in need of care, court approval of a treatment plan was improper and termination of parental rights was reversed. In re B.N.Y., 2003 MT 241, 317 M 291, 77 P3d 189 (2003).

Attempt to Use Writ of Habeas Corpus to Demand Physical Presence of Children Removed From Parent in Abuse and Neglect Proceeding — Petition Properly Denied: The mother petitioned the District Court for a writ of habeas corpus demanding that her children be physically present for an abuse and neglect hearing because they were material witnesses and had been removed from her custody unlawfully. The petition was denied. On appeal, the mother cited In re Bertelson, 189 M 524, 617 P2d 121 (1980), for the proposition that a writ of habeas corpus was the appropriate procedural device to bring the custody matter before a court. The Supreme Court disagreed and distinguished Bertelson because the mother's position ignored the substantial differences between dissolution proceedings and abuse and neglect proceedings, differences that were not at issue in Bertelson. The court also cited its earlier holding in In re B.P. & A.P., 2000 MT 39, 298 M 287, 995 P2d 982 (2000), in which it was held that the children were properly removed from the mother's home. Because temporary custody of the children with the state was legal, relief pursuant to habeas corpus premised on illegal restraint was not available to the mother under these circumstances. In re B.P. & A.P., 2001 MT 219, 306 M 430, 35 P3d 291 (2001).

Denial of Writ of Habeas Corpus to Compel Attendance of Children in Abuse and Neglect Hearing Not Violative of Due Process Rights or Right to Confront Witnesses: The mother petitioned the District Court for a writ of habeas corpus demanding that her children be physically present for an abuse and neglect hearing because they were material witnesses and claiming that the writ was necessary to ensure her due process rights by having the children available to rebut allegations against her at the hearing. The petition was denied. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Although the mother was entitled to an opportunity for a meaningful hearing, that opportunity need not be provided at the expense of the children whose best interests were the paramount focus of the proceeding, and subjecting the children to direct and cross-examination could exacerbate the abuse that they had already experienced. Denial of the petition did not violate the mother's right to confront witnesses because the children were not her accusers and she had no right to confront them. Rather, the abuse and neglect case was brought by the state, and the mother had ample opportunity to confront and examine the state's witnesses and experts at the hearing, so her due process rights were met. In re B.P. & A.P., 2001 MT 219, 306 M 430, 35 P3d 291 (2001).

Parties in Dissolution Proceeding Not Same as Parties in Abuse and Neglect Proceeding — Res Judicata Inapplicable: During marriage dissolution proceedings, the mother was granted custody of the children, but during a subsequent abuse and neglect proceeding, permanent custody was granted to the father. The mother appealed the placement on grounds that it constituted a readjudication of the earlier custody order in her favor in the dissolution action, in violation of the doctrine of res judicata. The Supreme Court disagreed. Four criteria must be met for res judicata to apply, the first of which is that the parties or their privies are the same. The mother failed to meet this criteria because in the dissolution action, the parties were the mother and father, while in the abuse and neglect proceeding, the parties were the state, the children, and the mother. Despite the fact that the state was investigating claims of abuse within the family during the dissolution action, it was not a party to that action and did not petition for investigative authority and protective services (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427) for the children until the dissolution was final. In re B.P. & A.P., 2001 MT 219, 306 M 430, 35 P3d 291 (2001).

No Treatment Plan Required to Terminate Parental Rights When Child Abandoned: A mother's parental rights were terminated based on the determination that she had abandoned her children, and the mother appealed. The children had been in out-of-home placement for longer than 1 year, and the mother had no contact with the children for almost 6 years, so no court-approved treatment plan was ever devised for the mother. The Supreme Court found that the mother's minimal efforts to contact the Department of Public Health and Human Services after termination proceedings were initiated were not sufficient to show the mother's intent to resume the care of her children, so the District Court did not err when it terminated the mother's parental rights on grounds of abandonment. A treatment plan is not required when the District Court finds that a parent has abandoned a child. In re J.J. & C.J., 2001 MT 131, 305 M 431, 28 P3d 1076 (2001).

Stipulation Not Considered Sufficient Adjudication of Youth in Need of Care — Lack of Jurisdictional Prerequisite to Terminate Parental Rights: The mother entered into a stipulation with the state that her children were youths in need of care only upon several conditions: (1) her parental rights would remain intact; (2) the children would reside with their grandmother; (3) the Casey Family Program would manage the children's cases; (4) the mother would always have contact with the children even if the program was required to intervene between the mother and grandmother; and (5) at an appropriate time when the mother was ready, the program, the Department, and the mother would devise a treatment plan that would be completed by the mother in order to regain custody of the children. At a subsequent hearing, the Department proposed a permanency plan that involved removing the children from their grandmother. The mother contended that the proposal amounted to a failure to abide by the conditions of the stipulation, thereby voiding the conditional stipulation that the children were youths in need of care and precluding the District Court's authority to terminate her parental rights. The Supreme Court agreed. Although a stipulation may be an acceptable alternative to an adjudicatory hearing in many circumstances, the fundamental nature of the rights of a parent requires that the process by which a stipulation is drafted and signed needs to be closely scrutinized. In this case, the stipulation was drafted by the County Attorney and signed by the mother without the benefit of legal counsel and essentially allowed the court to determine that the youths were in need of care without a finding that they were abused or neglected and without a hearing as required by 41-3-402 (renumbered 41-3-427). The mother had conflicting feelings about the removal of the children from their grandmother's care and relied on her understanding from the stipulation that the Department would not remove the children or terminate her parental rights, so she did not complete her treatment plan. Only a few days after the initial hearing, she promptly began work toward completion of the treatment plan and had made significant progress, particularly considering the unexpected death of her mother, by the time of the next hearing. Despite the change in circumstances resulting from the death, the Department did not grant the mother any additional time to complete the treatment plan, nor did the Department offer any evidence that the mother had abused or neglected the children. Under the unique facts of this case, the Supreme Court held that the District Court incorrectly found that the stipulation sufficed as an adjudication that the children were youths in need of care. Without that adjudication, the District Court lacked the jurisdictional prerequisite to terminate the mother's parental rights, so the Supreme Court reversed. In Re Custody and Parental Rights of M.W. & C.S., 2001 MT 78, 305 M 80, 23 P3d 206 (2001).

Finding That Child Is Youth in Need of Care Prerequisite to Transfer of Custody: The exigent protection of the health and welfare of a child is paramount when the state's initial intervention into otherwise private family matters reveals an actual or potentially dangerous or unhealthy environment requiring the removal of the child from a custodial caregiver. The legal determination that a child is a youth in need of care is a jurisdictional prerequisite for a court-ordered transfer of custody. The first question in a termination proceeding is whether the District Court correctly adjudicated the child as a youth in need of care, and the state need only offer clear and convincing evidence that the court properly adjudicated the child as a youth in need of care in order for the court to inquire into the actual fitness of the parent. In re A.M., 2001 MT 60, 304 M 379, 22 P3d 185 (2001).

Parent Not Represented by Counsel During Show Cause Hearing Regarding Whether Child a Youth in Need of Care — Due Process Rights Not Violated: At the time of a show cause hearing on whether her child was a youth in need of care, the mother was an indigent mental patient civilly committed to the state hospital. She appeared at the hearing without representation of counsel. The mother contended that the District Court violated her due process rights by making that critical determination regarding the child when she was unrepresented. Although in In re A.S.A., J.L.A., G.A., & A.J.A., 258 M 194, 852 P2d 127 (1993), the Supreme Court held that the constitutional right to due process guarantees an indigent parent the right to court-appointed counsel in parental rights termination proceedings, the court has not extended the right to counsel to a pretermination proceeding in which the focal issue is whether a child is a youth in need of care. Rather, appointment of counsel at any time prior to the initiation of termination proceedings is within the discretion of the District Court. In this case, the initial determination that the child was a youth in need of care was made by order pursuant to a finding of probable cause even before the mother's first appearance in any proceedings when the District Court relied on a report submitted by a social worker showing that the child was abused or neglected or in danger of abuse or neglect and that removal from the home was necessary to protect the child's welfare. Subsequent to the initial determination, the District Court reached the same conclusion on at least three separate occasions when the mother was represented by counsel, including one hearing when the social worker was subjected to cross-examination by the mother's counsel. The Supreme Court applied In re M.F., 201 M 277, 653 P2d 1205 (1982), and in re D.S., H.S., R.S., R.S., J.S., R.S., & K.S., 253 M 484, 833 P2d 1090 (1992), and in holding that the state is not required to provide counsel at proceedings concerning temporary investigative authority or temporary custody. Thus, the mother's due process rights were not violated when the District Court made the determination that the child was a youth in need of care at a time when the mother was not represented by counsel. In re A.M., 2001 MT 60, 304 M 379, 22 P3d 185 (2001).

Petition Need Not Allege Abuse or Neglect — Facts Establishing Probable Cause Sufficient to Issue Order for Protective Services: A petition for temporary investigative authority (TIA) and protective services (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427) must state the authority requested and facts establishing probable cause that the youth is abused or neglected or in danger of being so and must be accompanied by an affidavit or Department report stating in detail the facts on which the request is based. There is no statutory requirement that the petition contain an allegation of abuse or neglect or the evidence that the Department would present in support of its petition. The fact that the mother stipulated to a 90-day TIA, but not to protective services or the removal of the children from the home, believing that she would retain custody of the children during the 90-day period, did not preclude the District Court from ordering removal of the children from the home. The best interests of the child is paramount and takes precedence over parental rights in abuse and neglect proceedings. In re B.P. & A.P., 2000 MT 39, 298 M 287, 995 P2d 982, 57 St. Rep. 179 (2000).

Threatened Harm to Child — Denial of Motion to Dismiss Proper: When the mother surreptitiously contacted the father, who had had his parental rights terminated after being convicted of murdering the couple's other child, the state petitioned to terminate the mother's parental rights as well. Although witnesses unanimously agreed that the mother and child enjoyed a caring, nurturing, well-bonded mother-son relationship, there was also evidence that the mother would require a period of years to overcome her tendency to enter into addictive relationships with men in which she would not keep her child safe from abuse by her partner. The mother moved to dismiss the petition as inadequate as a matter of law, contending that there was not a sufficient basis to find that the child was a youth in need of care or evidence that she had abused the child. A youth in need of care is one who is abused or neglected, which means that the child has suffered harm or threatened harm to the child's health or welfare. Harm means, inter alia, harm that occurs when a parent exposes or allows the child to be exposed to an unreasonable risk by failing to intervene or eliminate the risk. Threatened harm means substantial risk of harm to the child's health or welfare. The absence of proof of physical abuse by the mother did not mean that the petition must fail because a parent does not have the privilege of inflicting brutal treatment upon each child in succession before the children may individually obtain the protection of the state. Under the circumstances, the motion to dismiss the petition was properly denied. In re J.A.B., 1999 MT 173, 295 M 227, 983 P2d 387, 56 St. Rep. 675 (1999), following In re T.Y.K., 183 M 91, 598 P2d 593 (1979).

Statute Constitutional — Abandonment by Noncustodial Parent: Father whose parental rights were terminated questioned the constitutionality of 41-3-609 with regard to noncustodial parents. The Supreme Court found that the legal relationship between father and child did not change despite the facts that the mother was awarded custody and that the father failed to continue in his obligations to the child. In determining what constitutes abandonment, this section considers the action of the parent responsible for the child's welfare, not the action of the custodial or noncustodial parent. In re M.W., 234 M 530, 764 P2d 1279, 45 St. Rep. 2107 (1988).

Finding of Abuse, Neglect, or Dependency Necessary Before Consideration of Best Interests of the Child: M.G.M. was born out of wedlock and had little contact with her natural father until the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) placed M.G.M. in a foster home and terminated her mother's parental rights. The Department then sought to terminate the father's parental rights. To terminate his parental rights, the court must first find that the child is abused, neglected, or dependent (see 1995 amendment). Only when such a finding has been made can the court apply the best interests of the child test. In re M.G.M., 201 M 400, 654 P2d 994, 39 St. Rep. 2191 (1982).

Prior Felony Conviction — Factor to Be Considered in Parental Termination Proceedings: Although a criminal background does not disqualify one from having custody of his children, it is a factor and should be considered in child abuse and neglect proceedings under 41-3-102. Although the crime itself may not be relevant to the proceeding, the conduct of the father on parole may be, thus the admission of a prior felony conviction at such a hearing was not error. In re T.J.D., J.L.D. & R.J.W., 189 M 147, 615 P2d 212 (1980).

Standard of Proof: The State must show by clear and convincing evidence that the child is neglected or abused before parental rights may be terminated. This standard more adequately furthers the policy of family unity than does the preponderance of evidence standard. In re T.J.D., J.L.D. & R.J.W., 189 M 147, 615 P2d 212 (1980); In re Inquiry Into J.L.B., Youth in Need of Care, 182 M 100, 594 P2d 1127 (1979), followed in In re T.A., 249 M 186, 814 P2d 994, 48 St. Rep. 634 (1991).

Removal of Children Warranted: The District Court did not abuse its discretion when it granted the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services' (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) petition for permanent custody and authority to consent to adoption of three children since they were adjudged dependent (see 1995 amendment) and neglected and there was ample evidence to warrant removal from their parents. In re G., Youth in Need of Care, 174 M 321, 570 P2d 1110 (1977).

Failure to Make Required Findings: The District Court abused its discretion in awarding permanent custody to the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) because it patently failed to make the required findings that the child was "abused, dependent [see 1995 amendment], or neglected" and therefore was without power to effect a permanent transfer of custody to a nonparent. In re Fish, 174 M 201, 569 P2d 924 (1977).

Custody Awarded Nonparent: Permanent custody cannot be awarded to a nonparent on the basis of the "best interest" test, it being appropriate only to determine custody rights between natural parents, but rather when natural parents forfeit their rights by not meeting the minimum standards of the child abuse, neglect, and dependent (see 1995 amendment) statutes. Henderson v. Henderson, 174 M 1, 568 P2d 177 (1977).

Constitutionality: This section is not unconstitutionally vague, ambiguous, or uncertain. In re Burgdorf, 170 M 116, 551 P2d 656 (1976).

Constitutionality — Due Process — Least Drastic Alternative: This section is not unconstitutionally vague. When no showing of prejudice is made, mother is represented by counsel in neglect proceeding, and when no demand for a hearing is made, there is not a denial of due process. Mother's attitude may cause court to dispense with evaluation of least restrictive alternative. In re Burgdorf, 170 M 116, 551 P2d 656 (1976).

Sufficiency of Evidence: When the record clearly reflects an established, continuing pattern of abuse and neglect, the decision of the court declaring children to be abused and neglected and awarding custody to the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) with the right to grant an adoption will be sustained. In re Bessette, 170 M 122, 551 P2d 653 (1976).

Insufficient Evidence to Overcome Policy to Preserve Family: Mother's failure to find suitable housing and a decent job after death of father is insufficient adversity to dissolve the family absent a concrete showing that it would be in the best interest of the children. It was a clear abuse of discretion by District Court to award permanent custody to Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) because policy of the State of Montana as declared by the Legislature is to preserve the unity and welfare of the family whenever possible. Div. of Child Welfare Serv. v. Fisher, 169 M 254, 545 P2d 654 (1976).

"Dependent" and "Neglected" Distinguished: A "dependent child" (see 1995 amendment) is one who must be supported by someone other than its natural or legal guardians, while a "neglected child", which is a broader term, describes a situation where there has been parental failure to exercise the degree of care demanded by family circumstances. In re Vikse, 147 M 417, 413 P2d 876 (1966).

ABUSE AND NEGLECT

Defendant's Fathering of Own Child Following Assault of Child — Sentencing Condition That Defendant Not Engage in Contact With Children Under 15 Years of Age Affirmed: Rowe was convicted of felony criminal endangerment and misdemeanor negligent endangerment after assaulting a 2-year-old child whom Rowe was babysitting. As a condition of sentence, the District Court prohibited Rowe from having contact with any child under 15 years of age unless supervised by an approved adult. Rowe appealed the sentencing condition on grounds that because he married and fathered a child following conviction, the sentencing condition effectively precluded him from contact with his own child and violated his fundamental right to parent. Nevertheless, the Supreme Court affirmed. Citing In re A.M., 2001 MT 60, 304 M 379, 22 P3d 185 (2001), the court noted that the child abuse and neglect statutes reflect the tension between the need to protect family unity whenever possible and the need to provide for the protection of children whose health and welfare are or may be adversely affected and further threatened by the conduct of those responsible for their care and protection, including a parent. Undisputedly, Rowe had an anger problem, and he participated in anger management for several years before the assault but voluntarily stopped taking his medications 2 to 3 weeks prior to the assault. Rowe also committed other incidents of violence in addition to the assault and posed a substantial risk of harm to his own child, so the District Court did not abuse its discretion by imposing a sentencing condition precluding Rowe's contact with his own child. St. v. Rowe, 2009 MT 225, 351 M 334, 217 P3d 471 (2009).

Out-of-State Conviction of Indecency With Child Considered Aggravating Circumstance for Purposes of Terminating Parental Rights: A father was convicted in Texas of indecency with a child. A Montana District Court considered the Texas conviction as an aggravating circumstance in terminating the father's parental rights. On appeal, the father contended that in Texas, the crime of indecency with a child was analogous to indecent exposure and asserted that the state did not introduce clear and convincing evidence that the Texas crime would constitute sexual abuse under Montana law to qualify as an aggravating circumstance. The Supreme Court disagreed. In Montana, the definition of child abuse includes indecent exposure, and the District Court properly concluded that the Texas conviction constituted an aggravating circumstance under Montana law. In re. M.A.L., D.L., & T.L., 2006 MT 299, 334 M 436, 148 P3d 606 (2006). See also In re L.M.A.T. & B.L.F.T., 2002 MT 163, 310 M 422, 51 P3d 504 (2002).

Chronic and Severe Neglect Inclusive of Emotional Neglect: In terminating parental rights without reunification services, the state relied on 41-3-423 and 41-3-609 in a case of chronic, severe neglect of a child. A parent asserted that parental rights may not be terminated based on a finding of severe emotional neglect, but the Supreme Court held that by definition, neglect includes psychological harm to a child. Here, the parent's ongoing drug use and repeated incarceration resulted in the parent's unavailability to the child and inconsistent caregiving, and this neglect in turn produced high anxiety and emotional disturbance in the child. Parental rights were thus properly terminated based on chronic, severe emotional neglect. In re Custody & Parental Rights of D.S., 2005 MT 275, 329 M 180, 122 P3d 1239 (2005).

Failure to Protect Child From Physical Abuse and to Feed Child — Sufficient Evidence of Abuse: Following termination of her parental rights, a mother contended that there was insufficient evidence to find that she had abused her child. The Supreme Court disagreed. There was convincing testimony that the mother failed to protect the child from physical abuse by her boyfriend and that on at least one occasion, she neglected to feed the child until 4:30 p.m. This evidence met the statutory definition of child abuse or neglect, and the characterization of her treatment of the child as abuse was not clearly erroneous. In re Custody & Parental Rights of C.J.K., 2005 MT 67, 326 M 289, 109 P3d 232 (2005).

Proper Finding That Youths in Need of Care — Expert Testimony Based in Part on Hearsay — Adequate Exercise of Independent Factfinding Judgment: The District Court found that two youths were in need of care. The mother appealed on grounds of insufficient evidence and contended that the District Court erroneously adopted the state's findings of fact and conclusions of law without substantial change, but the Supreme Court affirmed. The record contained sufficient credible evidence to support the findings that the children were abused and neglected by the mother's actions that injured the children's capacity to function emotionally or psychologically and thus were youths in need of care. Additionally, it was not error for the District Court to rely on the testimony of a psychology expert, even though the testimony was based in part on hearsay, because the facts and data relied on by the expert were of the type typically relied on by experts in the field of psychology. Moreover, although the verbatim adoption of findings and conclusions of the prevailing party is not favored, the District Court in this case did not in fact adopt the state's findings and conclusions verbatim, but rather exercised independent factfinding judgment. In re A.R. & I.R., 2005 MT 23, 326 M 7, 107 P3d 457 (2005), distinguishing In re Inquiry Into J.L. & D.L., 2000 MT 289, 302 M 254, 14 P3d 473 (2000).

Adjudication of Child as Youth in Need of Care Based on Prospective Abuse Proper: A mother relinquished custody of her three children after the District Court determined that the children were in need of care. When she became pregnant again, the state moved for emergency protective services for the fourth child upon its birth. The father contended that because the child was removed from the parents at birth, it was never abuse or neglected and thus could not properly have been adjudicated as a youth in need of care. Citing In re C.P., 2001 MT 187, 306 M 238, 32 P3d 754 (2001), the Supreme Court disagreed. The circumstances related to the prior termination of the mother's parental rights to her three children had not changed, and because she would also be the primary caregiver for the fourth child, there was substantial risk to the health and welfare of the newborn child as well, so the District Court did not err in adjudicating the fourth child as a youth in need of care based on prospective abuse. In re K.C.H., 2003 MT 125, 316 M 13, 68 P3d 788 (2003).

Failure to Hold Adjudicatory Hearing to Determine Whether Children in Need of Care — Termination of Parental Rights Improper Absent Adjudication of Status of Children: The District Court held several hearings concerning temporary investigative authority, granting several extensions, and also held several hearings concerning granting temporary legal custody, which was extended twice. The state then filed a petition to terminate the mother's parental rights. Temporary legal custody was extended a third time pending a hearing on the termination hearing. At the hearing, the mother's parental rights were terminated, and she appealed. The Supreme Court found that there had never been an adjudicatory hearing at which the District Court heard testimony or received evidence concerning whether the children were abused or neglected. The hearing for temporary legal custody did not equate to an adjudication by the court that the children were youths in need of care, even in light of an alleged stipulation by the mother to that effect. Absent an adjudicatory hearing and an adjudication that the children were youths in need of care, termination of parental rights was improper, and the order was reversed. In re M.O., M.O., & M.O., 2003 MT 4, 314 M 13, 62 P3d 265 (2003).

Substantial Risk of Harm to Child — Parental Rights Terminated Despite Lack of Evidence of Abuse or Neglect: A girl was born to a mother who was later divorced and remarried. When the girl was 15, she had sexual intercourse with her stepfather and conceived a baby. The state petitioned for temporary investigative authority (TIA) and emergency protective services (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427) over both the girl and her baby, pursuant to 41-3-402 (renumbered 41-3-427). The mother then agreed to divorce the stepfather so that he could marry the girl. The petition regarding the girl was dismissed because she was married and was no longer subject to the mother's parental control. At the show cause hearing on the petition regarding protection of the baby, a state social worker testified that, although there was no indication of actual abuse or neglect of the baby, there was concern for the baby's safety should the baby be placed in the home with the girl and stepfather. The state ultimately petitioned to terminate the girl's parental rights to the baby. The District Court determined that the baby was a youth in need of care and terminated the girl's parental rights. The girl appealed on grounds that the court's determination that the baby was a youth in need of care was erroneous, absent any evidence of abuse, neglect, or abandonment, and that the petition for TIA (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427) was insufficient on its face because it contained no allegations that the baby was abused or neglected. However, the definition of abuse or neglect in this section includes either actual harm or the substantial risk of harm. Thus, the report required by 41-3-427 need set forth in detail only facts supporting the petition's request for TIA (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427) based on the assertion that a child is abused or neglected or is in danger of being abused or neglected. The social worker's testimony was considered sufficient to support a finding that there was substantial risk of harm to the baby if returned to the girl's custody; therefore, the District Court's determination that the baby was a youth in need of care was correct. The court's finding that under the circumstances, the baby had little hope of a normal emotional, moral, and psychological development with his parents was also supported by substantial evidence and was not clearly erroneous, based on the social worker's testimony that the girl's relationship with the stepfather was unhealthy, that the family unit exhibited extremely poor boundaries, and that the girl had obvious psychological damage from being sexually abused by her father and would, without successful treatment, be unable to set appropriate boundaries for the baby or be able to understand the risk of harm that her relationship with the stepfather posed to the baby. The Supreme Court affirmed. In re D.T.H., 2001 MT 138, 305 M 502, 29 P3d 1003 (2001).

Child in Danger of Abuse and Neglect Subject to Adjudication Regardless of Whether Actual Abuse or Neglect Occurred: A child who is in danger of being abused or neglected may be considered a youth in need of care regardless of whether actual abuse or neglect occurred, irrespective of a parent's care for the child prior to the parent's incarceration or commitment to a mental hospital. In re A.M., 2001 MT 60, 304 M 379, 22 P3d 185 (2001).

Source of Children's PTSD Not Traceable to Father — No Abuse of Discretion by Court That Held Children Not Suffering From Abuse and Neglect Caused by Father — Temporary Investigative Authority (See 2001 Amendment to 41-3-427) and Temporary Legal Custody Properly Terminated: John, who pleaded guilty to negligent homicide in the death of his psychotic wife, Nancy, petitioned the District Court for the termination of temporary investigative authority (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427) and temporary legal custody of the Department of Public Health and Human Services, and the petition was granted. The Supreme Court held that the Department's authority was properly terminated because the District Court could not and did not find that the posttraumatic stress disorder (PTSD) suffered by John's children was caused by their father's behavior. The expert testimony given at trial showed that the children's PTSD could have been caused by living with their psychotic mother and not by their father's killing of their mother and his subsequent attempt to cover up the murder. The Supreme Court held that the District Court properly found that the children were not abused or neglected by their father and that the District Court therefore did not abuse its discretion when it granted John's petition and terminated the Department's authority. In re Inquiry Into J.L. & D.L., 2000 MT 289, 302 M 254, 14 P3d 473, 57 St. Rep. 1219 (2000).

Failure to Detect and Prevent Abuse: In an action to terminate a mother's parental rights, although the District Court found that the mother knew of her daughters' sexual abuse, the court specifically stated that her knowledge of the abuse was irrelevant to its ultimate determination because the mother failed to notice what was occurring and repeatedly left the children with persons who were not competent or safe caretakers. Such conduct satisfies the requirements of this section. In re Inquiry Into M.M., 274 M 166, 906 P2d 675, 52 St. Rep. 1170 (1995).

Proof of Sexual Abuse Not Necessary to Conclusion That Child Is Youth in Need of Care: A finding that a child was sexually abused was not a prerequisite to a conclusion that the child was a youth in need of care warranting placement of the child with the Department of Family Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services). The conclusion was proper in light of the combination of the testimony of four expert witnesses, a video deposition of the child, a series of nude photos of the child taken by the parents, evidence of spousal physical abuse in the presence of the child, and the fact that the father did not provide as evidence the results of his court-ordered psychological evaluation. In re H.D., 256 M 70, 844 P2d 114, 49 St. Rep. 1141 (1992).

Evidence of Abuse and Neglect Sufficient to Find Youth in Need of Care: When a mother's actions over a 4-year period were marked by indifference to and neglect of her parental responsibilities, including failure to assume physical care of her son and insensitivity to his emotional needs, the District Court did not err in determining that the child was a youth in need of care and that his well-being would be best served by remaining in the custody of his grandparents. In re R.T.L.P., 238 M 384, 777 P2d 892, 46 St. Rep. 1354 (1989).

Custody Transfer Supported by Evidence of Substantial Impairment: A psychologist testified that a child suffered substantial impairment of psychological function during her stay with her natural father and would be at risk of increased emotional stress if the placement continued. The evidence presented was sufficient to prove that the child was a youth in need of care and to support the lower court transfer of custody to the state, with reasonable visitation rights maintained by the father. In re M.G.M., 228 M 184, 741 P2d 770, 44 St. Rep. 1443 (1987).

Three Prerequisites for Termination of Parental Rights: The Supreme Court found substantial credible evidence that the three prerequisites for termination of parental rights were met: (1) that S.B. was a youth in need of care under the statutory definitions of 41-3-102 since the child failed to thrive due to carelessness of the parent (citing In re C.A.R. & P.J.R., 214 M 174, 693 P2d 1214, 41 St. Rep. 2395 (1984)); (2) that a court-approved treatment plan was unsuccessful (citing In re R.J.W., 197 M 286, 642 P2d 1072, 39 St. Rep. 568 (1982)); and (3) that the conduct or condition rendering the parent unfit to provide adequate care was unlikely to change within a reasonable time (citing In re R.J.W., supra). In re S.B., 223 M 36, 724 P2d 168, 43 St. Rep. 1512 (1986).

Mother's Lack of Care — Harm Caused to Children's Physical and Mental Welfare — Children Abused and Neglected: In applying the applicable definitions to the present case, the trial court properly determined the two children were youths in need of care because they had been abused and neglected by their mother. This abuse and neglect resulted from their mother's failure to care for and attend to the children, causing serious physical problems and injury to their cognitive and emotional development. Also, their mother allowed a sexual assault to be committed against one of the children, which resulted in harm to the child's welfare. The mother's conduct was unlikely to change significantly in the future. Under these circumstances, the court properly terminated the mother's parental rights and awarded permanent custody with the authority to consent to adoption to the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services). In re C.A.R. & P.J.R., 214 M 174, 693 P2d 1214, 41 St. Rep. 2395 (1984).

Evidence Supporting Designation as Youth in Need of Care: Evidence that the child failed to thrive in the family home, that both parents refused to comply with recommended drug and alcohol abuse treatment programs, and that the mother had been unsuccessful in learning how to care properly for her child was sufficient to support designation of the child as a youth in need of care. In re R.J.W., 197 M 286, 642 P2d 1072, 39 St. Rep. 568 (1982).

Extreme and Prolonged Uncleanliness: Regardless of any actual proof that a parent intentionally inflicted injuries upon his child, the occurrence of serious and frequent, yet unexplained, physical injuries to the child is sufficient to properly bring the child within the statutory definition of abuse or neglect. Additionally, the statute is broad enough to include extreme and prolonged uncleanliness under the definition of neglect. In re A.J.S., 193 M 79, 630 P2d 217, 38 St. Rep. 947 (1981).

Substantial Evidence to Support Finding of Neglect or Abuse: Where the evidence offered in a proceeding to declare youths in need of care included testimony by two clinical psychologists that the mental and physical state of appellant's offspring deteriorated when the offspring was in the care of appellant and that appellant's newborn child would also suffer the same consequences, and also testimony to the effect that appellant was physically abusive, there is substantial credible evidence to support the District Court's conclusion that appellant's offspring were in need of care and termination of parental rights was justified. Based upon examination of the offered evidence, in relation to the declared policy of this state to promote normal childhood development and to provide for the protection of children whose health and welfare are or may be adversely affected by the conduct of those responsible for their care, the District Court found the offspring abused or neglected as those terms are defined in 41-3-102. In re J.L.F. and H.A.F., 192 M 63, 626 P2d 253, 38 St. Rep. 533 (1981). See also In re C.A.R. & P.J.R., 214 M 174, 693 P2d 1214, 41 St. Rep. 2395 (1984).

Declaration of Child as Youth in Need of Care — Custody Awarded to Agency — Evidence of Abuse or Neglect: A child diagnosed as failing to thrive was given to foster parents. Professional personnel all agreed that the child in question was failing to thrive and that the child's condition deteriorated while in the care of the natural mother. The child's condition improved dramatically while in foster care. The District Court's finding and conclusion that the child was a neglected child was supported by "clear and convincing" evidence and the court was justified in permanently depriving the natural mother of the child and transferring legal custody to SRS (now Department of Public Health and Human Services). In re M.R.L., 186 M 468, 608 P2d 134 (1980).

Termination of Parental Rights — Factors Considered: When the following things were considered, the record supported the conclusion that the father's rights were adequately considered prior to termination of parental rights and that the decision to terminate them was supported by credible evidence: (1) the father was notified of the hearing, was present, and was represented by counsel; (2) professional testimony indicated the father would not be able to provide enough influence to offset the marked deprivation anticipated to continue for the child; (3) the father was found to have made no effort to assist the mother in learning to become a good parent; (4) the father had visited the child only once in 6 months when the child was in a foster home and had been reported to have abused the child. In re L.F.G., 183 M 239, 598 P2d 1125 (1979).

Youth in Need — Best Interests of Child — Mental Condition of Parent as Sole Factor: When the District Court considered the best interests of a child only after first determining that the child was in fact abused or neglected, it met the required standard. Considering the mental condition of the mother as the primary if not the sole factor, but having evidence that the child would not receive even minimally satisfactory maternal care and would be exposed to extremely high chances of developing a mental condition similar to that of the mother, sufficient credible evidence was before the District Court to support the District Court's decision that the child was a youth in need of care. The Supreme Court rejected the view that mental condition of a parent could not be the sole factor supporting a severance of parental rights. In re L.F.G., 183 M 239, 598 P2d 1125 (1979).

Protection of All Children When Abuse of One Less Than Another: A parent does not have the privilege of inflicting brutal treatment upon each of his children in succession before they individually obtain the protection of the state by virtue of 41-3-101. Section 41-3-101, et seq., grants to the District Court the ability to make a determination of neglect and abuse as to all children in a family based on the policy that abuse of one child has a detrimental effect on the other children's development. In re T.Y.K., 183 M 91, 598 P2d 593 (1979), followed in In re B.T., B.T., M.T., & M.T., 223 M 287, 725 P2d 230, 43 St. Rep. 1728 (1986), In re T.C. & R.C., 240 M 308, 784 P2d 392, 46 St. Rep. 2148 (1989), In re J.A.B., 1999 MT 173, 295 M 227, 983 P2d 387, 56 St. Rep. 675 (1999), and In re M.B., J.B., & W.B., 2004 MT 304, 323 M 468, 100 P3d 1006 (2004).

Definition of Neglect: The definition of neglect includes emotional deprivation, inadequate nutrition, and extreme and prolonged uncleanliness of the child. In re Inquiry Into J.L.B., Youth in Need of Care, 182 M 100, 594 P2d 1127 (1979).

Termination of Parental Rights: The state may not terminate a parent's right to raise his or her own child merely because a court or state agency feels that a nonparent has more financial resources or pursues a preferable lifestyle. In re Inquiry Into J.L.B., Youth in Need of Care, 182 M 100, 594 P2d 1127 (1979).

Absence of Abuse or Neglect: Judgment was reversed and custody of two children taken from their maternal aunt and returned to the natural father since there was no showing that the children were abused or neglected. The court improperly deprived the father of custody by means of the subterfuge of a guardianship that had outlived the purpose for which it was created. In re Guardianship of Doney, 174 M 282, 570 P2d 575 (1977), followed in Babcock v. Wonnacott, 268 M 149, 885 P2d 522, 51 St. Rep. 1224 (1994). See also In re J.B., 278 M 160, 923 P2d 1096, 53 St. Rep. 901 (1996).

Youth in Need of Care — Transfer of Custody: It was clear from the record that appellant was unwilling or unable to provide care necessary for the physical and emotional well-being of her children, and testimony supported the court's finding that the children were abused and neglected youths in need of care within the meaning of this section and its judgment transferring permanent legal custody of the children to the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) pursuant to 41-3-406 (renumbered 41-3-438). In re Moyer, 173 M 208, 567 P2d 47 (1977).

Children's Best Interest and Welfare Paramount Concern: Substantial credible evidence that father maltreated children and was incompetent, coupled with evidence mother did not provide proper or sufficient food, clothing, or sanitary or medical care was sufficient to support finding and judgment that children were dependent and neglected, awarding permanent care, custody, and control to proper state agency, with right to consent to children's adoption. In re Jones, 168 M 1, 539 P2d 1193 (1975).

Mental Retardation Due to Emotional Deprivation: Children who have become mentally retarded due to emotional deprivation and lack of environmental stimulation are neglected children within the meaning of the law. In re Olson, 164 M 431, 524 P2d 779 (1974).

Fitness of Parents:

Minor children were dependent (see 1995 amendment) and neglected within meaning of the statutory definition, notwithstanding possible fitness of natural mother for their custody, when she had acquiesced and permitted them to remain in care and custody of welfare department. In re Bad Yellow Hair, 162 M 107, 509 P2d 9 (1973).

A child was properly found dependent and neglected based on mother's declaration in waiver and the consent to adoption that she could not provide care and guidance and could not perform duties of a parent. Application of Hendrickson, 159 M 217, 496 P2d 1115 (1972).

Evidence of mother's use of welfare funds to supply her alcoholic needs, lack of medical care for her children, threats to kill the children, and other failures to make proper provision for the children warranted a finding that the children were neglected and the entry of an order committing them to custody of the state. In re Corneliusen, 159 M 6, 494 P2d 908 (1972).

ABANDONMENT

No Evidence of Willful Parental Abandonment — Termination of Parental Rights Not Warranted: After only sporadic contact between a father and his child over a period of several years and failure of the father to fully comply with child support obligations, the mother petitioned to terminate the father's parental rights on grounds that the father had abandoned the child. The District Court denied the petition and the mother appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Termination of parental rights based on abandonment of a child is not appropriate unless there is clear and convincing evidence that the child was willfully abandoned. In this case, the totality of the circumstances showed that the father's conduct was more in the character of immature, ignorant, uncertain, and lacking in diligent attention to his parenting responsibilities rather than a willful manifestation of intent to abandon the child. The mere fact that the father may have violated a court order within the meaning of 42-2-608 by failing to meet child support obligations in full did not mean that, as a matter of law, his parental rights must be terminated. Thus, although the father was not a model parent, the mother failed to meet the burden of demonstrating by clear and convincing evidence that the father was unfit. Therefore, the District Court properly applied its discretion in denying the petition. In re Stepparent Adoption of B.W.Z.-S., 2009 MT 433, 354 M 116, 222 P3d 613 (2009).

District Court's Finding of Abandonment Not Supported by Substantial Credible Evidence: The District Court terminated the parental rights of the natural father, holding that the father left the child under circumstances making it reasonable to believe that he did not intend to assume the child's care, thereby abandoning her. The Supreme Court stated that a parent's right of custody, though secondary to the child's best interests, is a fundamental liberty interest and must be protected by fundamentally fair procedures. The Supreme Court noted that the father, although in prison, had contacted the caseworker, County Attorney, and mother, among others, conveying that he was interested in parenting the child. In addition, the father had completed, parenting and anger management programs in prison even though the Department of Public Health and Human Services had not set up a treatment plan for the father as ordered by the District Court. The Supreme Court held that in light of the circumstance,s the action of the District Court in finding abandonment was clearly erroneous and remanded the case. In re S.S., K.C., & J.C., 2002 MT 270, 312 M 343, 59 P3d 393 (2002).

Improper Termination of Rights of Noncustodial Parent on Grounds of Abandonment Absent Showing of Willful Surrender of Custody: The District Court terminated a father's parental rights after finding that he abandoned his children by willfully surrendering physical custody for a period of 6 months without manifesting a firm intention to resume physical custody or making permanent physical arrangements for care of the children. The father appealed on grounds that he could not have willfully surrendered custody because he did not have physical custody of the children, who were initially with the mother and then in state foster care. The Supreme Court agreed. Acknowledging that pursuant to In re M.W., 234 M 530, 764 P2d 1279 (1988), it is possible for a court to find that a noncustodial parent has abandoned children, that finding must be based on evidence that the parent did not intend to resume the children's care, which was not the case here. Rather, the District Court in this case found that the father willfully surrendered physical custody, which was directly controverted by the fact that the father could not surrender custody that he did not have. Termination of the father's parental rights under that theory of abandonment was reversible error. In re T.C. & W.C., 2001 MT 264, 307 M 244, 37 P3d 70 (2001).

Abandonment Held to Constitute Abuse or Neglect: The father appealed the termination of his parental rights, arguing that the trial court's finding of abandonment did not constitute a finding of abuse or neglect required by statute to terminate parental rights. The Supreme Court ruled that in the past, it had implicitly upheld terminations on the basis of abandonment and that it was clarifying its earlier rulings by holding that abandonment is "harm to a child's welfare" and that "harm to a child's welfare" is a statutory ground for a finding of "child abuse or neglect" upon which a termination of parental rights may be founded. In re M.J.W., 1998 MT 142, 289 M 232, 961 P2d 105, 55 St. Rep. 563 (1998), followed in In re T.H. & C.D.F., 2005 MT 237, 328 M 428, 121 P3d 541 (2005).

Father Objects to Wrong Period Used to Determine Abandonment: The father appealed the termination of his parental rights on the basis that the court relied on statements by a social worker that pertained to a period before she had any personal knowledge of the case and therefore the statements were hearsay. The Supreme Court upheld the lower court's ruling, stating that only one sentence of the social worker's statement pertained to the early period and the rest of the report dealt with the period after the social worker had personal knowledge of the case. In re M.J.W., 1998 MT 142, 289 M 232, 961 P2d 105, 55 St. Rep. 563 (1998).

Evidence of Intent to Remedy Child's Situation During Time of Alleged Abandonment — Finding of Abandonment Reversed: The state alleged abandonment by father from September 1994 to January 1995. Evidence showed that father had an unimpressive history as a parent, offering little or no financial or emotional support during the first 5 years of his son's life. Nevertheless, father's actions during the time in question, including a petition to modify the dissolution decree to allow him visitation, contact with the mother to arrange visitation, and a trip from Wisconsin to visit his son, precluded a finding of abandonment during that finite period. In re W.Z., 285 M 16, 946 P2d 125, 54 St. Rep. 1019 (1997).

Termination of Parental Rights Based on Abandonment — Sporadic Attempts to Maintain Custody of Child Held Insufficient: Linda, the natural mother of P.E., left P.E. at a camping site with persons barely known to Linda. For the next 14 months, Linda traveled with persons with known criminal records, failed to give social workers her address and phone number on several occasions, failed to accept or maintain gainful employment, and failed to keep appointments with social workers or to appear at hearings to determine the status of P.E. Despite her expressed intent to resume physical custody, the District Court terminated her parental rights. Citing In re Adoption of C.R.D., 240 M 106, 782 P2d 1280 (1989), the Supreme Court affirmed, holding that Linda's sporadic attempts to maintain physical custody of P.E. did not constitute "a firm intention to resume physical custody" pursuant to this section. In re P.E., 282 M 52, 934 P2d 206, 54 St. Rep. 237 (1997).

Record to Reflect Parent's Intention to Abandon Child: The District Court held that the mother had been in prison for more than 6 months prior to the adoption hearing and that absence constituted abandonment. The Supreme Court reversed, holding that nothing in the record showed any intention on the mother's part to abandon her children and that a showing of such an intention was required in addition to an absence exceeding 6 months. In re Adoption of Jane, John, & Mary Doe, 277 M 251, 921 P2d 875, 53 St. Rep. 631 (1996).

Inability to Contribute Financial Support to Child Not Abandonment — Third-Party Petition to Adopt Properly Dismissed: Parents of S.P.M. were divorced and granted joint custody of the child. After a period of time, the father took sole custody after a Department of Family Services (now Department of Health and Human Services) worker filed a report concluding that the mother's new partner was abusing the child. The original joint custody decree was not modified. The father and child moved out of state for 4 years. On their return, the mother petitioned for custody and visitation. In response, the father's new wife petitioned to adopt the child. The District Court dismissed the wife's petition on the grounds that the mother's consent to adoption was required and that the mother had not abandoned the child. The 6-month requirement for abandonment in this section applies only to the willful surrender of custody, and even though the mother had not supported the child for 4 years, this did not constitute abandonment when the mother was not capable of providing financial support. Adoption of S.P.M., 266 M 269, 880 P2d 297, 51 St. Rep. 808 (1994).

Six-Month Abandonment Requirement Applicable Only to Willful Surrender of Physical Custody: The requirement in this section that applies a 6-month period to the definition of abandonment that is part of the definition of harm to a child's health or welfare is applicable only to the willful surrender of physical custody of the child. It was therefore proper to terminate the parental rights of a parent who left children for a 5-month period under circumstances that made reasonable the belief that the parent did not intend to resume care of them. In re A.E., C.E., S.R., & J.R., 255 M 56, 840 P2d 572, 49 St. Rep. 877 (1992), followed in In re W.Z., 285 M 16, 946 P2d 125, 54 St. Rep. 1019 (1997).

Natural Father's Consent to Adoption Not Required When Evidence Clear He Abandoned Child: The father had only visited with his daughter twice and called her on the telephone twice in 8 years and during that time never paid support. The Supreme Court affirmed the lower court's finding that the record contained clear and convincing evidence that the natural father had willfully abandoned his daughter, and therefore his consent to the child's adoption by her grandparents was not required. Adoption of C.R.D., 240 M 106, 782 P2d 1280, 46 St. Rep. 1979 (1989), followed in In re P.E., 282 M 52, 934 P2d 206, 54 St. Rep. 237 (1997).

Lack of Contact for Three Years Constituting Abandonment: The District Court did not abuse its discretion in terminating the parental rights of a father who abandoned his child by having no contact for 3 years and by indicating at no time his intention to resume custody until he learned his parental rights had been terminated. In re M.W., 234 M 530, 764 P2d 1279, 45 St. Rep. 2107 (1988).

Question of Abandonment Not Within Subject Matter Jurisdiction Regarding Modification: Husband was served a petition for adoption of his children by wife's new husband. The petition alleged abandonment. The District Court improperly considered the question of abandonment during the postdissolution hearing, which centered around the issues of visitation and unpaid child support. The question was outside the scope of issues included within the original dissolution decree, was to be decided by the court hearing the adoption proceedings, and should have been dismissed under former Rule 12(h)(3), M.R.Civ.P. (now superseded). In re Marriage of Callahan, 233 M 465, 762 P2d 205, 45 St. Rep. 1639 (1988).

Sufficiency of Evidence of Abused or Neglected Child: Evidence of failure to supply an adequate home environment and of abandonment for a 6-month period, plus evidence that a parent never complied with a court-approved treatment plan, was sufficient to warrant finding a youth to be abused or neglected and to allow temporary custody with the state. In re C.G., 230 M 117, 747 P2d 1369, 45 St. Rep. 63 (1988).

Evidence of Abandonment — Termination Proper: Evidence of abandonment warranting termination of parental rights was sufficient when the father had no contact and did not state any intention of resuming care of his children for a period of 2 years and did not make known his intention to acquire custody until 3 months after he was informed of the custody proceedings filed by the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services). In re M.J.D., C.K.D., & A.R.D., 225 M 200, 731 P2d 937, 44 St. Rep. 167 (1987).

Abandonment — Termination Proceedings to Be Fundamentally Fair: Termination of a natural parent's right to care and custody of a child is a fundamental liberty interest in Montana, which must be protected by fundamentally fair procedures. In a proceeding to terminate parental rights, the mother testified that on the advice of a social worker she refused to disclose to the father, who was in prison, the name of the child's foster parents; the father testified that while in prison he had tried to contact his son and see how he was doing. The Supreme Court held that this testimony contradicted the District Court's finding that father had abandoned child, and the Supreme Court remanded the case to the District Court for additional findings of fact and conclusions in light of specific requirements of 41-3-102. The Supreme Court also found the District Court record insufficient to conclude whether or not implementation of a treatment plan was attempted or feasible. The rights of parents cannot be terminated unless the parents have failed to comply with a court-approved treatment plan. Child Custody — Normal Development — Jurisdiction: When a child was present in Montana, having been abandoned by both of her natural parents, having been subjected to mistreatment and abuse, and having been threatened with further mistreatment and abuse, her situation met the test for jurisdiction expressed in 40-4-211. Wenz v. Schwartze, 183 M 166, 598 P2d 1086 (1979).

Abandonment: Mother leaving infant with babysitter for 1 night and not returning for approximately 1 month supports a finding of abandonment and a dependency upon the public for support when 2 days after mother's departure welfare department was awarded temporary custody. 2011 Amendment: Chapter 223 at beginning of (1) inserted exception clause and near middle inserted "a person is subject to a proceeding under this chapter and"; inserted (1)(d) and (1)(e) relating to youth or guardian residing in Montana; at beginning of (2) substituted "Venue is proper in" for "Either", after "located" inserted "or has resided within 180 days before the filing of a petition under this part", and near end after "resides" substituted "or has resided within 180 days before the filing of a petition under this part" for "has initial jurisdiction over a youth alleged to be a youth in need of care"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2011.

2003 Amendment: Chapter 504 in (2) at beginning inserted "Either" and after "located" inserted language concerning county where parent or guardian resides and deleted former second sentence that read: "Venue may be transferred to the county of residence of the youth's parent or guardian." Amendment effective October 1, 2003.

2001 Amendment: Chapter 114 in (1) substituted "the district court has jurisdiction" for "the youth court has concurrent jurisdiction with the district court"; and substituted (2) giving initial jurisdiction over youth alleged to be in need of care to county where youth is located and authorizing venue transfer to youth's parent's or guardian's county of residence for former (2) that read: "(2) Venue is determined pursuant to 41-5-204." Amendment effective October 1, 2001.

1995 Amendment: Chapter 458 in (1)(c), after "neglected", deleted "or caused the dependency of"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 14, 1995.

Case Notes

Parties No Longer Resident in Montana — Relinquishment of Montana Jurisdiction Proper: In 2000, a Montana District Court established child custody with the father, who lived in California, and held that the mother, a Montana resident, was not to have contact with the children until she addressed her psychological disorders. The father subsequently registered the Montana decision with the California courts to allow enforcement of the Montana decision in California, if necessary, and the mother moved to Minnesota. In 2007, the mother petitioned the Montana court to relinquish jurisdiction because none of the parties lived in Montana, but the court decided to retain jurisdiction and denied the petition, so the mother appealed. The father cited 41-3-103 in support of his contention that the Montana court retained jurisdiction because the case was a child abuse and neglect proceeding. However, Montana later adopted the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction and Enforcement Act (UCCJEA), which applies to and provides greater protections in child abuse and neglect proceedings, so the provisions of 40-7-103 prevail over 41-3-103. Under 40-7-202 of the UCCJEA, a Montana District Court retains exclusive, continuing jurisdiction of child custody proceedings until one of two specific events occurs, the second of which is a determination that none of the relevant parties presently reside in Montana. Thus, it was an abuse of discretion for the District Court to fail to make a determination whether the relevant parties lived in Montana. The Supreme Court reversed with instructions to relinquish jurisdiction over the Montana custody order. In re B.P. & A.P., 2008 MT 166, 343 M 345, 184 P3d 334 (2008).

Jurisdiction Based on Presence of Child in Montana: In a case in which the natural parents were residents of Wyoming but the child was born in Montana and present in Montana, the District Court had jurisdiction in an action to terminate parental rights under the abuse and neglect statutes, based on the presence of the child in Montana. In re Parental Rights of Baby Girl W., 249 M 206, 814 P2d 976, 48 St. Rep. 643 (1991).

Youth Court Jurisdiction Concurrent With District Court: The Youth Court has concurrent jurisdiction with the District Court over all youths who are within the state for any purpose. (See 2001 amendment.) Upon the petition for temporary custody filed by the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services), the Youth Court had the authority to determine that the child in question was a youth in need of care, to remove her from her mother's abusive home, and, following a dispositional hearing, to place her in the custody of her natural father. In re C.C., 237 M 246, 772 P2d 857, 46 St. Rep. 773 (1989).

Voluntary Relinquishment of Custody — Intervening Divorce — Custody Determined in Abuse and Neglect Proceeding: The District Court did not abuse its discretion in awarding custody of a child to his father after the parents, while still married, surrendered temporary custody to the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) because of the actions of the mother. Subsequent to the surrender of the child but prior to the award of custody, the couple began dissolution proceedings. The mother contended the court should have terminated the abuse and neglect proceeding. There was substantial evidence that the father was stable and nonabusive and the mother had potential for further abuse. Once a determination of abuse or neglect has been made, the court proceeds to a dispositional hearing. The intervening divorce and collateral custody matter were not relevant to the court in this matter. In re M.M., 200 M 244, 650 P2d 784, 39 St. Rep. 1716 (1982).

Jurisdiction Based on Service: The District Court lacked jurisdiction to find a minor child dependent and neglected and to award her to the care of the child welfare service when service of citation was by publication and there was no service of notice of the action on the father who was a resident of the county. In re Young, 143 M 230, 388 P2d 379 (1964).

Residence of Petitioner:

Since the District Court's jurisdiction had to be determined as of the time a proceeding was commenced, the issue of the petitioner's residence did not become moot even though the petitioner had established the necessary residence since the hearing in the proceeding. (See 2001 amendment.) State ex rel. Cowan v. District Court, 131 M 502, 312 P2d 119 (1957).

Where petitioner was not domiciled and thus not a resident of the county where the child resided, the District Court was without power to attempt to confer jurisdiction by an amendment to conform to the alleged proof that petitioner was domiciled in such county. State ex rel. Cowan v. District Court, 131 M 502, 312 P2d 119 (1957).

Case Notes

Active Efforts by State to Preserve Indian Families — Success Not Guaranteed: The Indian Child Welfare Act, 25 U.S.C. 1912(d), requires active efforts by the state to prevent the breakup of the Indian family. The family in this proceeding did not dispute the increased level of services but alleged that the state set up the family to fail. The Supreme Court found that the record did not show that the state actually caused the termination of the parents' parental rights; the outcome of remedial services depends on the parents' ability and willingness to develop the necessary skills to provide the child with a safe living environment, and the state cannot guarantee a successful outcome. In re I.B., 2011 MT 82, 360 Mont. 132, 255 P.3d 56.

Termination of Parental Rights — Requirements of Indian Child Welfare Act: Under the Indian Child Welfare Act of 1978, 25 U.S.C. 1901, et seq., the party seeking termination of an individual's parental rights to an Indian child under state law must satisfy the court that active efforts have been made to provide remedial services and rehabilitative programs designed to prevent the breakup of the Indian family and that the efforts have proved unsuccessful. The party seeking termination has the burden of proving beyond a reasonable doubt that the continued custody of the child by the parent or Indian custodian is likely to result in serious emotional or physical damage to the child. Case Notes

Party Entitled to Cross-Examine GAL Issuing Report — Violation of Due Process — Harmless Error: In a termination of parental rights proceeding, the District Court did not allow the father to cross-examine the child's guardian ad litem (GAL) who had prepared and submitted a written report. The Supreme Court held that a court violates a party's due process rights when it does not allow the party to cross-examine a witness who has issued a written report to the court. In this case, the failure to allow the father to examine the GAL constituted harmless error, as the report did not contain any information not already before the District Court. In re R.M.T., 2011 MT 164, 361 Mont. 159, 256 P.3d 935.

No Denial of Fair Procedures in Grant of Long-Term Custody of Child to State — Failure of Parent to Properly Object to Procedures at Hearing: Long-term custody of a child was granted to the state. The father appealed on grounds that he was denied fundamentally fair procedures in the custody proceedings, contending that: (1) the District Court failed to hold a permanency hearing within the statutory deadline; (2) the state failed to submit the statutorily required prehearing report to the District Court; (3) the state failed to develop a plan with any elements of permanency; (4) the state tried to terminate his visitation rights without satisfying the requisite statutory criteria and burden of proof; and (5) the District Court erroneously granted the state a second chance to prove its case. The Supreme Court considered each claim in turn, and affirmed. Although the permanency hearing occurred after the statutory deadline in 41-3-412 (renumbered 41-3-445), the father did not raise the issue in District Court or advise the District Court of the appropriate remedy as required, and raising the issue in a proposed conclusion of law did not constitute a proper objection. The father also neglected to object to the absence of a prehearing report either at the hearing or by pretrial motion, so those issues were not properly preserved for appeal. The contention that the state failed to develop a plan with any elements of permanency was belied by evidence showing that the child had made reasonable progress toward a settled placement. The question of whether there was any merit to the state's attempt to terminate visitation was moot because the District Court reinstated visitation at the permanency hearing. Moreover, disallowing the state a second opportunity to present its case would have required that the District Court overlook the best interests of the child by ignoring substantial evidence that the child continued to suffer both emotionally and mentally. It was the father who objected to the form of the evidence as first offered, and because the evidence was originally offered in a form authorized by statute, the child's best interests were paramount, and the father could not demonstrate prejudice in the District Court's granting of another hearing to hear the evidence. In re M.W. & L.W., 2002 MT 126, 310 M 103, 49 P3d 31 (2002).

Denial of Request to Remove Guardian Ad Litem Not Error: At the hearing on the petition for TIA and protective services (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427), the mother requested removal of the guardian ad litem who had worked with the family for 2 years. The District Court declined, which was not error in light of the lack of evidence that the guardian had not performed the required statutory duties. In re B.P. & A.P., 2000 MT 39, 298 M 287, 995 P2d 982, 57 St. Rep. 179 (2000), affirmed in In re B.P. & A.P., 2001 MT 219, 306 M 430, 35 P3d 291 (2001).

No Standing by Former Parent to Object to Child's Placement or Assert Child's Rights: Once the parent-child relationship is terminated by the District Court, a former parent has no standing to object to the court's subsequent placement of the child with the Department or by adoption. Similarly, a former parent has no standing to assert a violation of the child's rights as guardian ad litem because the former parent no longer represents the child. In re E.A.T. & T.A.T., 1999 MT 281, 296 M 535, 989 P2d 860, 56 St. Rep. 1133 (1999).

No Requirement That Parent Pay Fees and Costs of Guardian Ad Litem: Pursuant to a petition for temporary investigative authority and protective services (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427), three minor children were removed from their home and later returned to their parents' care. The District Court ordered the parents to reimburse the county for the fees and costs of the guardian ad litem appointed to represent the children. However, neither the plain language of 41-3-303 (renumbered 41-3-112), its legislative history, nor its statutory context suggest any intent by the Legislature to require parents to pay for guardian ad litem representation following a petition for protective services. The District Court order constituted reversible error. In re Inquiry Into A.W., D.G., & M.G., Jr., 1999 MT 42, 293 M 358, 975 P2d 1250, 56 St. Rep. 186 (1999).

Failure to Notify Guardian Ad Litem of Adoption Proceedings — Reversible Error: A guardian ad litem is required to represent a child in every case in which child abuse or neglect is alleged, and that representation continues until the child is permanently placed. Therefore, failure by the court to notify an unplaced child's guardian ad litem of a hearing on a petition for permanent adoption constituted reversible error. In re F.H., 272 M 342, 901 P2d 96, 52 St. Rep. 791 (1995).

Amendment effective July 1, 2001.

1993 Amendment: Chapter 610 at beginning of (1) inserted exception clause; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1993.

1987 Amendments: Chapter 260 inserted (1)(e) requiring that, for Indian child whose care is under review, foster care review committee appoint, if possible, Indian person knowledgeable about Indian culture.

Chapter 609 in first sentence of (2), after "department", deleted "or the youth court" and after "41-3-1122" deleted "or 41-3-1121(2)".

1983 Amendment: Chapter 201, in (1), increased minimum committee membership from four to five; inserted (1)(e) requiring appointment of foster parent to foster care review committee.

Chapter 465, in (2), changed "41-3-104" to "41-3-1122" and "41-5-801(2)" to "41-3-1121(2)".

Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to SB 228 [Ch. 297, L. 1981] provided: "A statement of intent is required for this bill because in addition to amending sections 41-3-104, 41-3-501, 41-5-801 [renumbered 41-3-1122; 41-3-1102; and 41-3-1121, now repealed], and 53-4-112 [renumbered 52-2-112], the bill creates rulemaking authority for the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services [now Department of Public Health and Human Services] to administer a review of children in foster care under the department's supervision or for whom the department is making payment under section 41-3-104(2) or 41-5-801(2) [renumbered 41-3-1122(2); and 41-3-1121(2), now repealed].

It is the intent of this bill to indicate the legislature's support of permanency planning for children in foster care and to direct the department to continue its efforts in this area. This bill is intended to encourage reduction of the numbers of children in foster care; to expediently return children to their natural homes when possible, or to free the children for alternate permanent placements; thereby assuring the appropriate utilization of public funds and that the best interest of children in placement in Montana are being met by the department's program.

Rulemaking is primarily necessary to implement Section 2 [41-5-807] [renumbered 41-3-1115] and subsection (3) of Section 1 of the bill [41-3-104] [renumbered 41-3-1122]. These sections require that a foster care review committee be established by the court to conduct reviews of children in foster care and provide written reports to the youth court and the department. Rules would identify which children are to be reviewed, and would list precisely what information is to be shared with the review committee, when the committees are to conduct business, the general guidelines for the committees' operation, the time limitations for conducting the reviews, and who may participate in the review. As for the information to be reported, the rules will ask for:

(1) summary reports of the review to include the recommendations of the committee regarding the continuation or discontinuation of foster care and reasons; treatment needs of the child; and court action;

(2) sufficient information to allow the tracking of the reviews; to facilitate: follow-up services, compliance with court orders, agency decisions, and response to committee recommendations; and to provide necessary reports on the department's foster care program."

Case Notes

Findings of District Court Regarding Custody of Child With Mother Not Erroneous Despite Evidence of Inappropriate Physical Contact Between Child and Mother's Relative: As part of a paternity action, the mother was awarded primary physical custody, and the father appealed. An amended parenting plan arrived at during mediation gave each parent physical custody of the child during alternating months. Near the end of one month's visit with the father, the child divulged that inappropriate physical contact with her stepgrandfather had occurred while in the mother's custody. The father moved for modification of the parenting plan. The District Court was faced with conflicting evidence in the case, receiving testimony from the stepgrandfather that no inappropriate touching occurred, as well as testimony from professionals who opined that sexual abuse had occurred. Additional expert testimony suggested that the child's constant travel was a possible cause of her troubling behavior and that the experts who suggested that sexual abuse occurred had not followed standard protocols when interviewing the child. Lay testimony indicated that it was unlikely that the stepgrandfather had an opportunity to commit the alleged abuse. The court ultimately determined that sexual abuse had not been proved. The father appealed on grounds that the court's findings were insufficient, that the court erred in not giving the father custody based on the evidence presented, and that the court erred by apparently rejecting the testimony of the child's clinical psychologist and the disclosures made by the child relating to sexual abuse. The Supreme Court noted that credibility determinations are within the province of the trier of fact and held that, in light of the conflicting testimony, the trial court's findings and conclusions were sufficient to support the court's decision. Although the trial court did not specifically articulate the elements of 40-4-212, it clearly made determinations that it considered to be in the child's best interests. Failure to list the contentions of a particular witness, such as the child's clinical psychologist, was not sufficient to determine a per se abuse of discretion on the part of the trial court. Without a clear showing of abuse of discretion, the Supreme Court declined to disturb the decision and affirmed the denial of the father's motion to modify the parenting plan. In re Paternity & Custody of A.D.V., 2001 MT 74, 305 M 62, 22 P3d 1124 (2001).

Jury to Be Informed of Duty to Report: In a negligence action alleging abuse of a foster child, the Supreme Court reversed, ruling that the District Court erred in refusing to instruct the jury of the Department's statutory duty to notify the County Attorney of a child abuse report. Newville v. St., 267 M 237, 883 P2d 793, 51 St. Rep. 758 (1994).

Reporting Mandate and Immunity Applied to Social Worker Reporting Event Sixteen Years Previous: A clinical social worker running a therapy group was subject to the reporting mandate of this section, despite assurances of strict confidentiality and despite the fact that alleged incidents of sexual abuse occurred 16 years earlier. Absent evidence that the social worker acted in bad faith or with malicious purpose, the immunity granted by 41-3-203 was properly extended. Gross v. Myers, 229 M 509, 748 P2d 459, 44 St. Rep. 2176 (1987).

Ability to Support Child: Since ability of parents to support children was not determined in compliance with sections 10-506 and 10-507, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed), but was left to testimony to be elicited at a later hearing, order compelling parents to pay support costs in action depriving them of the children was set aside. In re Phelps, 145 M 557, 402 P2d 593 (1965).

Attorney General's Opinions

Centralized Intake System Authorized — Fulfillment of Reporting Requirements Absent Properly Adopted Administrative Rule: By amendment in 2001, the Legislature required the Department of Public Health and Human Services to assess reports of child abuse or neglect in order to determine whether investigation or some lesser response is appropriate and granted the Department the authority to determine the appropriate response time, but did not specify how the Department was to implement the legislation. The Department developed the centralized intake system as the method to meet the statutory directive. However, the Department established the system without formal adoption as an administrative rule. Because the centralized intake system implements a law and affects private rights or procedures available to the public, the Attorney General held that the system is a rule, subject to the Montana Administrative Procedure Act. Thus, until adopted as an administrative rule, the centralized intake system may not be used to restrict which Department personnel may receive a report. Further, counties are no longer involved in providing child protective services, so they are no longer local affiliates of the Department, as the term is used in this section. Therefore, mandatory reporters may fulfill their reporting obligations by reporting child abuse and neglect to a local child protective services worker or supervisor or to the Department through the Centralized Intake Bureau. 50 A.G. Op. 4 (2004).

Balance of Competing State Interests in Prevention and Reporting of Child Abuse — Abrogation of Communication Privileges by Statute: Although the state has competing interests in the prevention of child abuse and neglect and in protecting the communication privileges between physicians or mental health practitioners and their patients, the communication privilege is abrogated under 41-3-201 in cases where the professional obtains the information as a result of his treatment of the child. 42 A.G. Op. 7 (1987).

Statutory Reporting Requirements Not Preempted by Federal Confidentiality Provisions: The provisions of this section requiring disclosure of child abuse or neglect known by a chemical dependency counselor are not preempted by the confidentiality provisions of the federal Comprehensive Alcohol Abuse and Alcoholism Prevention, Treatment, and Rehabilitation Act amendments of 1974, 42 U.S.C. 290dd-3. 42 A.G. Op. 7 (1987).

2005 Amendment: Chapter 382 in (7) at end after "department" deleted "through its local office"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 25, 2005.

2003 Amendments — Composite Section: Chapter 406 inserted (5)(c) requiring department and social worker conducting investigation to destroy unsubstantiated child abuse or neglect reports 30 days after end of 3 years of unsubstantiated determination unless person has previous or subsequent unsubstantiated report or order issued and allowing person who is subject of unsubstantiated report and has no subsequent report or order issued prior to October 1, 2003, and after elapse of 3-year time period to request destruction of records; in (6) inserted reference to subsection (5)(c); and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2003.

Chapter 555 in (5)(a) near middle before "protective services" inserted "emergency" and inserted "or voluntary protective services, pursuant to 41-3-302"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2003.

2001 Amendment: Chapter 311 in (1) near beginning of first sentence inserted "the department shall promptly assess the information contained in the report and make a determination regarding the level of response required and the timeframe within which action must be initiated. If the department determines that an investigation is required". Amendment effective October 1, 2001.

1999 Amendment: Chapter 566 near beginning of (1) after "report" deleted "as required by 41-3-201"; in (3) at beginning of third sentence substituted "If a child interview is considered necessary" for "If considered appropriate by" and after "peace officer" substituted "may conduct an interview" for "conducting an interview of the child, an employee of the school attended by the child involved may participate in any interview" and inserted fourth sentence authorizing interview to be conducted in presence of parent, guardian, or employee of school or facility; in (4) at beginning inserted reference to 41-3-205(3) and in two places inserted reference to audiotape; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 1999.

1997 Amendments: Chapter 514 in (1), in first sentence, inserted "the circumstances surrounding the allegations of abuse or neglect of the child, which may include an investigation at", inserted "the child's school or day-care facility", and after "or any other place where the child is present" deleted "into the circumstances surrounding the injury of the child" and near end of second sentence inserted "state or"; in (2), near beginning of first sentence, substituted "of alleged abuse or neglect" for "into the home of the child"; in (3), in third sentence after "employee of the", deleted "public" and at end deleted "if the child is enrolled in kindergarten through 8th grade"; in (5)(a), in first sentence, substituted "the department has reasonable cause to suspect" for "it appears" and after "abuse or neglect" substituted "the department may provide" for "the department shall provide" and in second sentence deleted provision that the Department shall advise the County Attorney of its investigation; inserted (5)(a)(i) requiring the Department, after interviewing the parent or guardian, if reasonably available, to document its determination regarding abuse or neglect; in (5)(a)(ii), at beginning, inserted "notify" and at end inserted "and determination, unless the notification can reasonably be expected to result in harm to the child or other person"; in (5)(b), in first sentence near beginning, substituted "is determined" for "appears", after "department" inserted "and the social worker, county attorney, or peace officer who conducted the investigation into the circumstances surrounding the allegations of abuse or neglect", and after "destroy all" inserted "of their" and in second sentence increased the completion date from 20 days to 30 days; in (6), in second sentence, substituted "documenting investigations and determinations of" for "containing"; and in (7), at end, substituted "through its local office" for "its local affiliate, and the county attorney of the county in which the facility is located". Amendment effective May 2, 1997.

Chapter 516 in (1), at end of second sentence, substituted "41-3-411" for "41-3-406".

Applicability: Section 20, Ch. 516, L. 1997, provided that this section applies to proceedings commenced on or after October 1, 1997.

1995 Amendments — Composite Section: Chapter 146 inserted (3)(b) (now (5)(b)) requiring destruction of records of reports of child abuse or neglect if the child is determined not to have been abused or neglected and the initial report is unfounded; in (4) (now (6)) at beginning of second sentence, inserted reference to subsection (3)(b) (now (5)(b)); and made minor changes in style. The Code Commissioner has renumbered the reference in (6) to subsection (5)(b) to reflect the amendments made by Ch. 564.

Chapter 546 in (5) substituted "department of public health and human services" for "department of family services"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1995. The amendment by Ch. 546 in (5) was rendered void by a style change in Ch. 146.

Chapter 564 inserted (2) authorizing initial investigation into child's home upon receipt of anonymous report, but prohibiting removal from home unless independent, corroborative information is developed within 48 hours of investigation; inserted (4) requiring unedited videotape to be made available to child's family upon request; in (5), in first sentence after "child", inserted "pursuant to 41-3-301" and in second sentence, after "county attorney", inserted "and the child's family"; in (6), after "department", inserted "and, upon request, to the family"; and made minor changes in style.

Saving Clause: Section 571, Ch. 546, L. 1995, was a saving clause.

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 564, L. 1995, provided: "WHEREAS, the Legislature finds it necessary to restore public confidence in the child protective system and to provide protection of individual and family civil rights as guaranteed by the state and federal constitutions."

1993 Amendment: Chapter 329 at end of (1) inserted "except as necessary to ascertain eligibility for federal assistance programs or to comply with the provisions of 41-3-406". Amendment effective April 13, 1993.

1989 Amendment: In (2) inserted last sentence relating to a public school employee's participation in an interview of the child. Amendment effective July 1, 1989.

1987 Amendment: Substituted "department of family services" for "department of social and rehabilitation services".

Case Notes

Unsubstantiated Reports From Another Jurisdiction — Prohibition on Use Not Retroactive: In an abuse and neglect proceeding in 2001, the court ordered the physician doing psychological evaluations of the parents to consider historical documents, including the father's unsubstantiated child neglect history from California from 1997 and a 1990 conviction for exhibiting a firearm. On appeal of the termination of parental rights, the mother asserted that the use of the information violated the spirit of the Montana statute requiring unsubstantiated reports to be destroyed after 3 years. The requirement to destroy unsubstantiated records was enacted in 2003 and was not retroactive. Without legislative intent, statutes do not apply retroactively, so the 2003 statute did not apply to the District Court's 2001 decision. The court did not err in requiring the physician to consider unsubstantiated allegations from California. In re D.B., 2004 MT 371, 325 M 13, 103 P3d 1026 (2004).

Home Visit Not Required: An investigation into the home under this section is not inadequate merely because the social worker did not visit the home. The parents refused to cooperate with the welfare department. Therefore, they will not be allowed to now complain that information is missing from the record. In re S.L.T., 215 M 289, 697 P2d 472, 42 St. Rep. 366 (1985).

Case Notes

No Error in Conducting In Camera Inspection of Abuse of Minor Investigative File: During a trial in which the defendant was charged with assault with a weapon for injuries sustained by one of the defendant's minor sons, the District Court did not err in denying the defendant access to a Child and Family Services Division investigative file. The District Court appropriately conducted an in camera inspection of the file pursuant to 41-3-205(2) and determined that the entire contents of the file should not be released. Evidence that a social worker failed to take notes during a meeting with the minor would not have bolstered the defendant's testimony. St. v. Knowles, 2010 MT 186, 357 Mont. 272, 239 P.3d 129.

Statute Not Facially Unconstitutional: Plaintiff, an entity authorized to obtain child abuse information pursuant to 41-3-205, reported allegations of child abuse and neglect at the Swan Valley Youth Academy, which prompted an investigation. Plaintiff was provided a final report and wished to disseminate the report without seeking a court order. Plaintiff filed an action to allow public dissemination and to invalidate 41-3-205(7) as facially unconstitutional because of the alleged failure of the statute to balance the public's right to know against the right of individual privacy. The District Court determined that disclosure of child abuse and neglect records required a case-by-case analysis and review of redacted materials. The court refused to provide plaintiff with prospective relief and granted summary judgment to the state, so plaintiff appealed. The Supreme Court noted that any future report prepared by the state regarding alleged abuse or neglect will present a unique factual scenario that requires a careful balancing of the constitutional provisions at issue, to be conducted according to the mechanism for balancing of interests provided in 41-3-205(2), which then properly permits public disclosure following in camera inspection and further redaction of private information. Thus, in light of the myriad of future factual scenarios to which 41-3-205 must be applied, the statute could not be determined to be facially unconstitutional. Disability Rights Mont. v. St., 2009 MT 100, 350 M 101, 207 P3d 1092 (2009). See also Havre Daily News, LLC v. Havre, 2006 MT 215, 333 M 331, 142 P3d 864 (2006).

Judicial Notice of Mother's Prior Termination Proceeding in Action to Terminate Father's Parental Rights — No Error: The District Court terminated a father's parental rights after taking judicial notice of the sealed record of the mother's prior termination proceeding. The father asserted error because the court took notice of facts that were not known and could not be discovered by the father. The Supreme Court disagreed. Rules 201 and 202, M.R.Ev. (Title 26, ch. 10), allow the District Court to take judicial notice of certain facts of record. Although sealed, the record was not entirely inaccessible because the father could have petitioned for disclosure of the records under this section, but he did not, even though he was aware of the prior proceeding. In re K.C.H., 2003 MT 125, 316 M 13, 68 P3d 788 (2003).

Denial of Defendant's Access to Rape Victim's Counselor and Counselor's Records Upheld: Muir was convicted of sexual intercourse without consent with a victim under 16 years of age. Prior to and during trial, Muir requested access to the victim's psychological counselor and to the counselor's records because the counselor was listed as a potential witness. However, after an in camera review of the records by the District Court, Muir was given access only to an investigator's note of an interview with the victim's counselor. The Supreme Court held that Muir was properly denied access to the counselor and the counselor's records because the victim's conversations with the counselor are privileged and the District Court found no exculpatory evidence in the records. Citing St. v. Reynolds, 243 M 1, 792 P2d 1111 (1990), the Supreme Court also reasoned that a defendant's right to pretrial discovery is not equivalent to a defendant's constitutional right of confrontation and that Muir had shown no correlation between the victim's emotional problems and her consent to sexual intercourse. St. v. Muir, 263 M 241, 867 P2d 1094, 51 St. Rep. 19 (1994).

Termination of Parental Rights — Father Not Allowed "In Camera" Inspection of Entire File: In proceedings to terminate a father's parental rights, when the father moved for an "in camera" inspection of the entire Department of Family Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) file and the Department objected to disclosure of reports prepared by the foster parents, it was not clearly erroneous for the District Court to deny disclosure of evidence in view of failure on the part of the father's counsel to attempt to limit or specify in any manner the information requested. In re M.A.W. & K.M.W., 256 M 296, 846 P2d 985, 50 St. Rep. 64 (1993).

Limited Discovery of Department Files Proper: It was proper for the District Court to conduct its own inspection of the Department of Family Services' (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) files and to produce for defendant's use those documents the court felt were relevant and necessary to the defense. Limited discovery, rather than complete disclosure, was warranted under this section. St. v. Goodwin, 249 M 1, 813 P2d 953, 48 St. Rep. 539 (1991).

Examination of Social Worker's File Not Allowed — No Violation of Constitutional Rights: Defendant in a child abuse case claimed his constitutional rights were violated by the District Court's refusal to allow him to examine the file of the social worker assigned to his case. The Supreme Court relied on Pa. v. Ritchie, 480 US 39, 94 L Ed 2d 40, 107 S Ct 989 (1987), in holding that Montana's child abuse confidentiality statute, this section, as it applies to file review, does not violate a defendant's right to confront his accusers. Further, as long as the trial court has the statutory authority to review the file in camera and to release material information from the file to the accused, defendant's right to a fair trial is fully protected. St. v. Thiel, 236 M 63, 768 P2d 343, 46 St. Rep. 182 (1989), followed in St. v. Donnelly, 244 M 371, 798 P2d 89, 47 St. Rep. 1600 (1990), and in St. v. Little, 260 M 460, 861 P2d 154, 50 St. Rep. 1124 (1993). See also St. v. Imlay, 249 M 82, 813 P2d 979, 48 St. Rep. 588 (1991), which overruled Donnelly with regard to augmentation of sentence for failure to admit guilt.

Censure of Attorney Disseminating Confidential Information Protected by Statute: A lawyer was publicly censured by the Montana Supreme Court for obtaining confidential information from his law firm's files and from the files of the County Attorney and for disseminating the information to parties not entitled to it, notwithstanding the confidentiality requirements of this section. Censure was changed from oral censure in the Supreme Court's courtroom to censure in writing by that court and placed in the court's records, because it would be a financial burden for him to appear in court as he lived out of state. In re Wyse, 215 M 82, 697 P2d 94, 42 St. Rep. 198 (1985).

Confidentiality of Records on Child Abuse and Neglect — Not Violative of Confrontation Rights: An attorney being disciplined for violating the confidentiality provisions of 41-3-205 did not prevail in his contention that the section conflicted with the right of confrontation guaranteed by Art. II, sec. 24, Mont. Const., and the sixth amendment to the United States Constitution because the attorney, in his zeal to get information relevant to his client, did not make an application to the court for permission to disseminate the information. In re Wyse, 212 M 339, 688 P2d 758, 41 St. Rep. 1780 (1984).

"Unauthorized Dissemination" and "Public Disclosure" Not Synonymous: The terms "unauthorized dissemination" in subsection (1) and "public disclosure" in subsection (3) are not synonymous. Any unauthorized dissemination, public or private, is prohibited under subsection (1); the term "public disclosure" comes into play if a request is made to the court to permit the same and the court finds such public disclosure necessary for the fair resolution of the issue before it. In re Wyse, 212 M 339, 688 P2d 758, 41 St. Rep. 1780 (1984).

Contempt for Violation — Defense Barred: Attorney charged with contempt of court for unauthorized dissemination, in violation of this section, of information in records of dependent and neglected child proceeding could not argue this section was vague where he admitted that he knew such a statute existed and that a court order was probably needed to obtain the information but did not bother to look up the statute prior to his dissemination. Wyse v. District Court, 195 M 434, 636 P2d 865, 38 St. Rep. 2005 (1981). See also In re Wyse, 212 M 339, 688 P2d 758, 41 St. Rep. 1780 (1984).

Contempt for Violation — Standards for Attorneys: Attorney charged with contempt of court for violating this section was a licensed professional and an officer of the court and was not subject to the reasonable man standard but to a higher standard, one dictated by the nature of his profession. Wyse v. District Court, 195 M 434, 636 P2d 865, 38 St. Rep. 2005 (1981). See also In re Wyse, 212 M 339, 688 P2d 758, 41 St. Rep. 1780 (1984).

Inclusion of Juvenile Record in Presentence Report: Section 41-3-205 does not support appellant's contention that it was improper to include his juvenile record in a presentence report since that section applies only to dependence and neglect situations and not to proceedings for delinquents under the Montana Youth Court Act. Section 41-5-604 (renumbered 41-5-216) does not support appellant's contention either, because the prevention of public dissemination of a juvenile record once that individual attains an age of majority is accomplished by sealing the presentence report. St. v. Radi, 185 M 38, 604 P2d 318 (1979).

Exception to Confidentiality: The confidentiality of privileged communications did not prevent disclosure of information obtained by school nurse, public nurse, and social welfare workers as evidence at custody hearing for dependent and neglected children. In re Jones & Peterson Children, 168 M 1, 539 P2d 1193 (1975).

Investigatory Interview — Presence of School Staff Member Prohibited: A school district policy requiring that an individual investigating a child abuse or neglect case have a school staff member present at the child's interview if the interview is conducted without parental notification is prohibited. 42 A.G. Op. 2 (1987).

Disclosure of Case Records and Reports of Child Abuse and Neglect: Absent a court order, 41-3-205 prohibits the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) from disclosing case records and reports of child abuse and neglect to: (1) the natural parents or parent or other person having legal custody of a child who is the subject of a dependency and neglect action filed under 41-3-401; (2) health care professionals who are treating a child suspected of being abused or neglected; (3) the noncustodial parent of a child who has been removed from the custodial parent following an incident of abuse or neglect; and (4) the natural parents or parent or other person having legal custody of a child who has been abused or neglected while in the care of foster parents. 41 A.G. 1995 Amendment: Chapter 546 in (1) substituted "department of public health and human services" for "department of family services". Amendment effective July 1, 1995.

Saving Clause: Section 571, Ch. 546, L. 1995, was a saving clause.

1991 Amendment: At end of (1) deleted "or 41-3-1123". Amendment effective July 1, 1991.

1987 Amendments: Chapter 287 inserted (2) authorizing Department to adopt rules governing disclosure of records of child abuse and neglect.

Chapter 609 at beginning substituted "department of family services" for "department of social and rehabilitation services" and after "personnel" deleted "and by employees of county welfare departments".

1987 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 287, L. 1987, provided: "This bill requires a statement of intent because it authorizes the department of social and rehabilitation services [now department of public health and human services] to adopt rules to govern the disclosure of case records on reports of child abuse and neglect. The legislature intends that the rules should include procedures or criteria for:

(1) requesting and disclosing information in the records;

(2) protecting the identity of person named in the records if rights of privacy require such protection;

(3) preparing records or reports (psychological, psychiatric, and medical) written by persons other than employees of the department;

(4) documenting disclosure of the records;
(5) amending, correcting, or expunging information in the records;
(6) approving or denying requests for disclosure of the records."

1983 Amendment: Changed 41-5-805 to 41-3-1123.

1979 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to HB 813 (Ch. 567, L. 1979) provided: "The provision of law dealing with abused, neglected, or dependent children; delinquent youths; and youths in need of supervision [now youth in need of intervention] recognize the principle that the parents or guardian of the minor is responsible for a fair share of the costs of supporting the minor when the minor is placed in a foster home, group home, or other form of custodial care. This bill is intended to provide a mechanism for determining the parents' or guardians' share of financial support in those situations involving the department of social and rehabilitation services [now department of public health and human services]. Three guiding principles interact to provide the thrust of the legislation. First, the welfare of the minor is of utmost concern. The focus is on the youth, and the law is designed to provide an opportunity for the youth to realize his potential. Secondly, the traditional privacy and security of the family are to be preserved. Thirdly and referred to above, the parents or guardian of a minor is responsible for the financial support of the minor. These three principles can and often do conflict with one another. This bill addresses investigations as to the ability of the parents or guardian to bear all or part of the cost of supporting a youth taken from their custody and attempts to strike a balance between these three principles by requiring that an investigation by the county welfare department [now local office of public assistance] into matters of financial status may not be made until a court, or, in the case of an informal adjustment under the Youth Court Act, a probation officer places the child in a foster home, child care agency, group home, or private treatment facility.

Rules developed pursuant to authority granted under this bill should provide procedures that insure the parents or guardian have access to the reports and data developed by both the department of social and rehabilitation services [now department of public health and human services] and the county welfare department and that guarantee investigations into financial and other matters will not intrude into private lives beyond the level necessary to protect the welfare of the child."

Case Notes

Father's Motion to Have Parental Rights Termination Proceeding Dismissed Because of Failure to Hold Timely Show Cause Hearing Not Considered on Appeal: The show cause hearing in a proceeding to terminate the father's parental rights was timely set within the required 20 days of the filing of the petition. At the hearing, the County Attorney requested a continuance to which the father did not object. The Supreme Court refused to consider the issue of whether the show cause hearing was timely on the basis that the father did not object to the continuance. In re M.H. & G.H., 2006 MT 208, 333 M 286, 143 P3d 103 (2006).

Erroneous Award of Custody at Adjudicatory Hearing Cured by Immediate Scheduling of Dispositional Hearing to Address Dispositional Issue Separately: The District Court failed to structure dispositional issues apart from adjudicatory issues when it granted temporary legal custody of two children to the state during an adjudicatory hearing. However, upon discovering the error, the court immediately scheduled a dispositional hearing to address the dispositional issue separately. Although not excusing the error, the Supreme Court held that holding a second dispositional hearing made the initial order placing the children with the state during the adjudicatory hearing the functional equivalent to an order of placement pending the dispositional hearing because temporary placement outside the home is allowed at every stage of the proceeding pursuant to 41-3-432, 41-3-437, and this section. The error was harmless and nonprejudicial and did not warrant reversal. In re S.C. & L.Z., 2005 MT 241, 328 M 476, 121 P3d 552 (2005).

Judicial Notice of Mother's Prior Termination Proceeding in Action to Terminate Father's Parental Rights — No Error: The District Court terminated a father's parental rights after taking judicial notice of the sealed record of the mother's prior termination proceeding. The father asserted error because the court took notice of facts that were not known and could not be discovered by the father. The Supreme Court disagreed. Rules 201 and 202, M.R.Ev. (Title 26, ch. 10), allow the District Court to take judicial notice of certain facts of record. Although sealed, the record was not entirely inaccessible because the father could have petitioned for disclosure of the records under 41-3-205, but he did not, even though he was aware of the prior proceeding. In re K.C.H., 2003 MT 125, 316 M 13, 68 P3d 788 (2003).

Failure to Dismiss Petition Not Reversible Error Despite Failure to Follow Forty-Eight-Hour Rule: Even though a petition for termination (now abuse and neglect petition—see 2001 amendment) and permanent custody was not filed until 13 days after emergency placement of the children, in violation of the 48-hour rule of this section, any error in not following the strict statutory procedure was harmless since the best interest of the children was the primary concern and the parent's due process rights were not violated. In re F.H., J.K., & B.K., 266 M 36, 878 P2d 890, 51 St. Rep. 649 (1994).

Qualified Immunity of Department Social Workers in Removing Children to Out-of-State Placement: Social workers who removed minor children from father's home without notice or hearing and arranged for them to stay in another state with their mother, who had joint custody, were not entitled to absolute immunity in father's civil rights action because their actions were neither quasi-prosecutorial nor quasi-judicial in nature. However, the social workers were entitled to qualified immunity because of the emergency nature of their actions and because they did not violate any clearly established constitutional or statutory right. Caldwell v. LeFaver, 928 F2d 331 (9th Cir. 1991).

Timely Filing of Petition: The filing of a petition for temporary investigative authority and protective services (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427) as to children who may be abused and neglected was timely and proper because of the exclusion of intermediate Saturdays, Sundays, and holidays from the computation time (see 2003 amendment). In re T.Y.K., 183 M 91, 598 P2d 593 (1979).

Duty to Adhere: The Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) has a duty to strictly adhere to the requirements of this section. In re G., Youth in Need of Care, 174 M 321, 570 P2d 1110 (1977).

Attorney General's Opinions

Exclusive Tribal Jurisdiction of Indian Children — No Departmental Jurisdiction: The Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) has no jurisdiction to provide child protection services to Indian children who are subject to exclusive tribal jurisdiction under the Indian Child Welfare Act, 25 U.S.C. 1901, et seq., or to children residing on the reservation and eligible for tribal membership. The scope of the Department's responsibility is unaffected by the child's eligibility, or lack thereof, for participation in Bureau of Indian Affairs programs, and the Department is not obligated to provide child protective services and benefits to the extent the federal program offers comparable assistance. 41 A.G. Attorney General's Opinions

Determination of Staffing Patterns of County Public Assistance Offices: Both the Department of Public Health and Human Services and county welfare boards have an interest in staffing patterns for county public assistance offices, and when possible, staffing patterns should be determined through a process of consultation and negotiation between the Department and the county welfare board. However, if an agreement cannot be reached through that process, the Department has the final authority for determining staffing patterns for the county public welfare office in a nonassumed county. (See 2001 amendments.) 48 A.G. Op. 18 (2000).

Retroactive Foster Care Payments: In the absence of a determination that foster care assistance was improperly denied, neither a County Department of Public Welfare nor the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) is required to retroactively pay foster care costs on behalf of a relinquished child. Where there is a determination made that foster care assistance was improperly denied, only the foster home involved is entitled to foster care payments. 38 A.G. Op. 11 (1979).

Public and Private Placement Agencies: County Departments of Public Welfare may not deny foster care payments solely because the child receiving foster care has been relinquished to a private rather than public placement agency. If eligibility is established, County Departments of Public Welfare are required to approve foster care payments to a foster home on behalf of a child who has been relinquished to a private placement agency. 38 A.G. Op. 11 (1979).

County Power — "4-C's": Counties, jointly with the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services), may contract with local "4-C's" projects to provide coordination and support of child abuse prevention and treatment services. 37 A.G. Op. 105 (1978).

Part 4
Abuse or Neglect Proceedings

Part Case Notes

Dismissal of Petition for Temporary Investigative Authority (See 2001 Amendment to 41-3-427) Without Review of Guardianship Action — Harmless Error in Light of Requirements of Indian Child Welfare Act: In compliance with 41-3-403 (renumbered 41-3-423), the District Court ordered a show cause hearing at which to consider a petition for temporary investigative authority (TIA) (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427) regarding two Indian children. At the hearing, the Deputy County Attorney offered an order and memorandum from a previously dismissed guardianship proceeding as evidence. The court did not admit the documentation as evidence, but took judicial notice of it. However, at the end of the hearing, the court dismissed the petition for TIA (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427) without reviewing any records from the guardianship proceeding and ordered the Department of Public Health and Human Services to immediately place the children with their father. The mother contended that it was error to dismiss the petition without reviewing the guardianship file. In order for courts to grant TIA (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427) petitions when Indian children are involved, the requirements of the Indian Child Welfare Act must be met. Under 25 U.S.C. 1912, active efforts must be made to provide remedial services and rehabilitation programs to prevent the breakup of the Indian family. In addition, any finding that continued custody of the child by the parent or Indian custodian is likely to result in serious emotional or physical damage to the child must be based on the testimony of qualified expert witnesses. Because these requirements were not met, the court could not have granted TIA (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427) even if it had reviewed the guardianship file, so its failure to do so, if erroneous, was harmless. In re M.P.M. & A.R.M., 1999 MT 78, 294 M 87, 976 P2d 988, 56 St. Rep. 327 (1999).

Error in Placing Custody With One Parent Following Dismissal of Petition for Temporary Investigative Authority (See 2001 Amendment to 41-3-427): In compliance with 41-3-403 (renumbered 41-3-423), the District Court ordered a show cause hearing at which to consider a petition for temporary investigative authority (TIA) (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427) regarding two Indian children. At the end of the hearing, the court dismissed the petition for TIA (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427) and ordered the Department of Public Health and Human Services to immediately place the children with their father. The Department argued on appeal that the court exceeded its authority in ordering transfer of custody to the father after the petition for TIA (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427) was dismissed. The Supreme Court held that when the District Court vacated the orders issued following filing of the petition for TIA (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427), it did not have authority to place custody with the father because nothing in the statutory framework or legislative intent authorizes the placement of a child with one parent, as opposed to the other, following dismissal of a petition for TIA (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427). The order transferring custody to the father was reversed. In re M.P.M. & A.R.M., 1999 MT 78, 294 M 87, 976 P2d 988, 56 St. Rep. 327 (1999).

Federal Indian Child Welfare Act — Temporary Custody Not in Compliance With Act — Otherwise Valid Parental Termination Not Invalidated: Child of Indian parents was placed in the temporary custody of the state in proceedings that may not have complied with the federal Indian Child Welfare Act (25 U.S.C. §1901, et seq.). Later, in proceedings that complied with the Act and before a different judge with different witnesses, the parents' rights were terminated and permanent custody was granted the state. The Supreme Court held that any failure to comply with the Act in the temporary proceedings would not invalidate the later termination because the proceedings are separate actions involving separate petitions and statutory guidelines. Indian Child Welfare Act — Effective Date: A proceeding for termination of parental rights initiated in state court prior to May 7, 1979, the effective date of the Indian Child Welfare Act of 1978 (25 U.S.C. §1901, et seq.) continues as a state proceeding, not subject to the transfer provisions to tribal court under the Act, even though, due to a bifurcation of hearings involving several fathers, one of these hearings was held after the effective date of the Act. Tribal Court Judgment Not to Be Filed as Foreign Judgment — Exception: A judgment, decree, or order of an Indian tribal court may not be filed as a foreign judgment under the Uniform Enforcement of Foreign Judgments Act unless the judgment, decree, or order concerns an Indian child custody proceeding. 44 A.G. Op. 15 (1991).

Exclusive Tribal Jurisdiction of Indian Children — No Departmental Jurisdiction: The Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) has no jurisdiction to provide child protection services to Indian children who are subject to exclusive tribal jurisdiction under the Indian Child Welfare Act, 25 U.S.C. 1901, et seq., or to children residing on the reservation and eligible for tribal membership. The scope of the Department's responsibility is unaffected by the child's eligibility, or lack thereof, for participation in Bureau of Indian Affairs programs, and the Department is not obligated to provide child protective services and benefits to the extent the federal program offers comparable assistance. 41 A.G. Op. 76 (1986).

Foster Care or Adoption Placement of Indian Children — No Department Payments Under Social Security Act: The Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) may not make payments under Title IV-E of the Social Security Act (42 U.S.C. 670 through 676) to Indian children whose foster care or adoption placement is subject to exclusive tribal jurisdiction under the Indian Child Welfare Act (25 U.S.C. 1901, et seq.). 41 A.G. Op. 76 (1986).

Transfer of Child Custody Proceeding to Tribal Jurisdiction — No Continuance of State Child Protection Services: Once a child custody proceeding has been transferred from state District Court to tribal jurisdiction under sec. 101(b) of the Indian Child Welfare Act (25 U.S.C. 1911(b)), the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) may not continue to provide child protection services or benefits to the Indian child. 41 A.G. 2001 Amendments — Composite Section — Coordination: Chapter 83 in (6) at end after "publication" substituted "as provided in 41-3-428 and 41-3-429" for "in the manner provided by the Montana Rules of Civil Procedure for other types of proceedings". Amendment effective March 20, 2001.

Chapter 194 in (2) in second sentence near end after "or neglected" deleted "or abandoned"; inserted (9)(b) regarding intervention by certain individuals in action if court determines intervention is in best interests of child; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2001.

Chapter 281 inserted (1) setting out kinds of relief that may be sought in a petition; in (3) deleted former first sentence that read: "Upon receipt of a petition, except a petition for temporary investigative authority, the court shall set a date for an adjudicatory hearing on the petition" and before "preference" inserted "highest"; inserted (5) providing which party has the burden of establishing probable cause and presenting evidence; in (6) at beginning of first sentence inserted exception clause and after "served personally with a copy of" substituted "all petitions" for "the petition and summons"; in (10)(a) at end inserted "and of the relief requested"; deleted former (10) through (12) that read: "(10) The petition may ask for the following relief:

(a) temporary investigative authority and protective services, as provided in 41-3-402;
(b) temporary legal custody, as provided in 41-3-406;
(c) appointment of a guardian pursuant to 41-3-421;
(d) termination of the parent-child legal relationship and either:

(i) permanent legal custody with the right to consent to adoption, as provided in 41-3-607; or

(ii) appointment of a guardian; or

(e) any combination of the provisions of subsections (10)(a) through (10)(d) or any other relief that may be required for the best interests of the child.

(11) A request for a determination that reunification services need not be provided pursuant to 41-3-403 may be made in conjunction with the filing of a petition requesting relief, as provided for in subsection (10) of this section.

(12) The petition may be modified for different relief at any time within the discretion of the court"; in (11) inserted second sentence requiring appointment of counsel for an indigent parent; inserted (12) regarding alternative dispute resolution proceedings; inserted (13) requiring written notice of certain rights and timelines; inserted (14) requiring that an order contain notice of a possible permanency hearing, notice of a possible petition of termination of parental rights, and notification that completion of a treatment plan does not guarantee return of a child; inserted (15) regarding appointment of a standing master; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2001.

Section 18(2), Ch. 281, L. 2001, a coordination instruction, provided: "(2) If House Bill No. 223 and [this act] are both passed and approved, then 41-3-401(6) [renumbered 41-3-422(6)] contained in [this act] must read as follows:

"(6) Except as provided in the federal Indian Child Welfare Act, if applicable, the parents or parent, guardian, or other person or agency having legal custody of the child named in the petition, if residing in the state, must be served personally with a copy of all petitions at least 5 days before the date set for hearing. If the person or agency cannot be served personally, the person or agency may be served by publication as provided in [sections 1 and 2 of House Bill 223] [41-3-428 and 41-3-429]."" House Bill No. 223 was approved as Ch. 83, L. 2001, and the appropriate change in text was made.

Chapter 311 in (4) in second sentence inserted reference to Montana Rules of Evidence and substituted "chapter" for "part"; deleted former (8) that read: "(8) Except when the proceeding is instituted or commenced at the request of the department, a citation must be issued and served upon a representative of the department before the court hearing"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2001.

1999 Amendments — Composite Section: Chapter 428 inserted (10)(c) relating to appointment of a guardian pursuant to 41-3-421; inserted (10)(d)(ii) relating to appointment of a guardian; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 1999.

Chapter 566 in (1) at end of first sentence after "petitions" substituted "under this chapter" for "alleging abuse or neglect", deleted former second sentence that read: "The county attorney, the attorney general, or an attorney hired by the department with the written consent of the county attorney or the attorney general may require all state, county, and municipal agencies, including law enforcement agencies, to conduct the investigations and furnish reports that may be necessary", and inserted second sentence requiring petition to be accompanied by department's affidavit; in (7) inserted second, third, and fourth sentences requiring that notice of judicial hearings and reviews be given to foster parents, preadoptive parents, or relatives caring for the child and providing that right to appear does not make person a party to action; inserted (11) providing that request for determination that reunification services need not be provided may be filed with petition requesting relief; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 1999.

1997 Amendment: Chapter 516 in (2), near middle of first sentence, inserted "except a petition for temporary investigative authority"; in (4), in first sentence after "5", inserted "working"; in (10)(a), at end, inserted "as provided in 41-3-402"; in (10)(b), at end, inserted "as provided in 41-3-406"; in (10)(c), at end, inserted "as provided in 41-3-607"; in (10)(d), at end, substituted "interests of the child" for "interest of the youth"; and made minor changes in style.

Applicability: Section 20, Ch. 516, L. 1997, provided that this section applies to proceedings commenced on or after October 1, 1997.

1995 Amendments — Composite Section: Chapter 458 in (1), after "by the county", deleted "welfare department or office of human services" and after "hired by the" substituted "department" for "county welfare department or office of human services"; in first sentence of (1), in (3), and in (9)(a), after "neglect", deleted "or dependency"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 14, 1995.

Chapter 546 in (8) substituted "department of public health and human services" for "department of family services"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1995.

Style changes in the chapters were slightly different. In each case, the codifier chose the most appropriate.

Saving Clause: Section 571, Ch. 546, L. 1995, was a saving clause.

1993 Amendment: Chapter 329 in (1) deleted former last sentence that read: "Investigations as to financial status may not be made prior to the adjudicatory hearing provided for in 41-3-404." Amendment effective April 13, 1993.

1987 Amendments: Chapter 463 at end of (2), after "dates", deleted "and must be heard within 20 days of the filing of the petition"; in (4), after "agency", substituted remainder of subsection, authorizing service by publication if personal service not possible, for former language that read: "resides out of state or is not found within the state, the rules of civil procedure relating to service of process in such cases shall apply"; near beginning of (5), after "event", inserted "personal"; and in (10)(c), after "relationship", inserted language concerning termination of permanent legal custody.

Chapter 609 in (8), after "commenced", substituted "at the request of" for "by a representative of" and substituted "department of family services" for "department of social and rehabilitation services".

1985 Amendment: In (1) near beginning, after "county attorney", inserted "attorney general, or an attorney hired by the county welfare department or office of human services", in second sentence at beginning substituted "The county attorney or attorney general, or an attorney hired by the county welfare department or office of human services with the written consent of the county attorney or attorney general" for "He"; in (2) near end of second sentence, after "dates", inserted "and must be heard within 20 days of the filing of the petition"; deleted former (10)(d) and (e) that read: "(d) permanent legal custody, including the right to consent to adoption;

(e) appointment of guardian ad litem"; in (12) near middle, after "appoint", deleted "a guardian ad litem for the youth or"; and deleted former (13) that read: "This section does not apply to a petition for temporary investigative authority and protective services."

1981 Amendment: Substituted present subsection (10)(c), relating to termination of parental rights and permanent custody, for former subsection (10)(c), which read: "(c) limited legal custody".

GENERAL

Adjudication of Youth in Need of Care Without Specific Request Affirmed: A parent asserted that the District Court lacked authority to adjudicate a child as a youth in need of care because there was no request for such adjudication contained in the initial petitions for emergency protective services and temporary investigative authority. The Supreme Court disagreed. The relief sought in a petition filed under 41-3-422 may include any relief required for the best interests of the child, and 41-3-432 allows a court to adjudicate a child as a youth in need of care at the show cause hearing for immediate protection and emergency protective services. Thus, the District Court was not foreclosed from adjudicating the child as a youth in need of care following filing of the initial petitions for emergency protective services and temporary investigative authority. In re B.S. & G.S., 2009 MT 98, 350 M 86, 206 P3d 565 (2009).

Dismissal Motion Properly Denied When Statutory Criteria Not Met: Based on the Supreme Court's prior holding in In re D.B. & D.B., 2007 MT 246, 339 M 240, 168 P3d 691 (2007) (In re D.B. I), the mother moved to dismiss a parental rights termination case on grounds that the District Court proceedings did not contain sufficient evidence to apply the proper statutory criteria required by In re D.B. I. The court denied the dismissal motion and the mother appealed. The Supreme Court affirmed. Only when the criteria of 41-3-424 are met may a petition be properly dismissed, and the mother failed to satisfy those criteria. The children remained youths in need of care and the District Court was required to provide some form of relief as established in 41-3-422, so dismissal was inappropriate and unavailable to the mother. In re D.B. & D.B., 2008 MT 272, 345 M 225, 190 P3d 1072 (2008).

Requirement That Child Be Adjudicated Youth in Need of Care Met by Parents' Stipulation in Adoption of Treatment Plans — Harmless Error: A father contended that all proceedings related to a parental rights termination were invalid because the children had never been formally adjudicated as youths in need of care. The Supreme Court found that in this case, the absence of a formal adjudication was harmless error because the parents previously agreed that their children were abused or neglected when the parents stipulated to that fact during the adoption of four separate treatment plans. The evidence of abuse and neglect was overwhelming, and if the parents had objected to temporary legal custody or to subsequent District Court findings or if they had disputed the status of the children as youths in need of care, the District Court could have easily made a ruling on the children's status at that time. The parents were afforded full due process at every stage and had ample opportunity to object to the proceedings and findings, yet they stipulated and agreed to the District Court findings through counsel at every turn. Although failure to adhere to statutory requirements governing termination proceedings will generally constitute grounds for reversal, this case was one of the rare occasions that application of the harmless error doctrine was warranted. The procedural error did not affect the outcome of the termination proceedings or substantively prejudice the parents, and termination was affirmed. Hearsay Evidence and Parental Rights Termination — Admission of Hearsay Evidence at Show Cause, Adjudicatory, and Termination Hearings Held Proper Because Children "Unavailable" — J.C.E. Case Distinguished — No Offer of Proof Made: Hearsay evidence in the form of videotaped interviews of young children talking with investigators about sexual abuse by their parents was admitted after the District Court found that the children were "unavailable" to testify because they would be traumatized by testifying against their parents in a courtroom setting. The Supreme Court held that the videotaped testimony was properly admitted by the District Court, based upon the thorough findings by the District Court, at the show cause hearing, the adjudicatory hearing, and the parental rights termination hearing. The Supreme Court distinguished St. v. J.C.E., 235 M 264, 767 P2d 309 (1988), because that case was a criminal case in which the right of confrontation under Art. II, sec. 24, Mont. Const., applied, whereas the case now before the Supreme Court was a civil case. The Supreme Court also held that the District Court properly analyzed the mother's attempt to call the children as witnesses as one of relevance, and because no offer of proof was made under Rule 103, M.R.Ev. (Title 26, ch. 10), by the mother, the Supreme Court could not conclude that the District Court acted arbitrarily. In re O.A.W., 2007 MT 13, 335 M 304, 153 P3d 6 (2007).

Standards Applicable to Termination of Indian Parental Rights — Active Department Efforts to Provide Services Required: The District Court terminated the parental rights of an Indian father after the children were removed from the father's custody a fourth time because of the father's abuse and neglect. The father appealed on grounds that: (1) the state did not make active efforts to provide remedial services; (2) the District Court relied on expert testimony based on the Department file rather than personal interviews; and (3) it was error not to grant the father's request for an extension of temporary legal custody. The Supreme Court affirmed on all issues. The father left no phone number or address with the social worker and moved multiple times. Without any involvement, the father prevented the Department from making active efforts at providing more intensive services. Second, the federal Indian Child Welfare Act requires testimony from a qualified expert witness, but does not require a specific form of that testimonial evidence or personal interviews, and a District Court need not conform its decision to a particular piece of evidence or a particular expert's report or testimony as long as a reasonable person could have found beyond a reasonable doubt that continued custody by an Indian parent or custodian is likely to result in serious emotional or physical damage to the child. Last, the District Court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to extend temporary custody because the Department had already provided active efforts and did not need more time to assist the father in attaining his goals. The District Court had an accurate perspective on the father's parenting abilities, and refusal to extend the temporary placement did not make the court's decision any less reasonable. In re A.N. & M.N., 2005 MT 19, 325 M 379, 106 P3d 556 (2005). See also In re Marriage of McKenna, 2000 MT 58, 299 M 13, 996 P2d 386 (2000), and In re I.B., 2011 MT 82, 360 Mont. 132, 255 P.3d 56.

Misdiagnosis of Rare Skin Disease as Evidence of Parental Sexual Misconduct — Newly Acquired Evidence Did Not Undermine Validity of Adjudication of Children as Youths in Need of Care — Termination of Parental Rights Upheld: After the parents' 4-year-old daughter was diagnosed as a probable victim of parental sexual misconduct, the court ordered a TIA and protective services for all five children, who were all under 5 years of age. Both parents were criminally charged with abuse and neglect of their children. The father remained in jail for 1 year. The children were tested and found to be developmentally delayed in their speech, and both parents were diagnosed with psychological disorders. Both parents were ordered to complete treatment plans, which they failed to complete. Eventually, their parental rights were terminated. Two years after the initial diagnosis, it was determined that the daughter's physical symptoms were the result of a rare skin disease called lichens sclerosis et atrophicus (LSA) rather than sexual abuse. The parents appealed the termination of their parental rights and argued that the District Court had erred in adjudicating the children as youths in need of care based on the misdiagnosis. The parents further argued that the allegations of sexual molestation because of the misdiagnosis tainted the entire proceedings to such a degree that they were deprived of their rights to due process and fundamental fairness, thereby invalidating the subsequent termination ruling. The Supreme Court upheld the District Court and held that, based on the developmental delays and psychological disorders, the District Court had adequate grounds independent of the LSA misdiagnosis for adjudicating the children as youths in need of care under this section and that the subsequent termination under 41-3-609 was valid. In re D.B., 2004 MT 371, 325 M 13, 103 P3d 1026 (2004).

Failure to Hold Adjudicatory Hearing to Determine Whether Children in Need of Care — Termination of Parental Rights Improper Absent Adjudication of Status of Children: The District Court held several hearings concerning temporary investigative authority, granting several extensions, and also held several hearings concerning granting temporary legal custody, which was extended twice. The state then filed a petition to terminate the mother's parental rights. Temporary legal custody was extended a third time pending a hearing on the termination hearing. At the hearing, the mother's parental rights were terminated, and she appealed. The Supreme Court found that there had never been an adjudicatory hearing at which the District Court heard testimony or received evidence concerning whether the children were abused or neglected. The hearing for temporary legal custody did not equate to an adjudication by the court that the children were youths in need of care, even in light of an alleged stipulation by the mother to that effect. Absent an adjudicatory hearing and an adjudication that the children were youths in need of care, termination of parental rights was improper, and the order was reversed. In re M.O., M.O., & M.O., 2003 MT 4, 314 M 13, 62 P3d 265 (2003).

Attempt to Use Writ of Habeas Corpus to Demand Physical Presence of Children Removed From Parent in Abuse and Neglect Proceeding — Petition Properly Denied: The mother petitioned the District Court for a writ of habeas corpus demanding that her children be physically present for an abuse and neglect hearing because they were material witnesses and had been removed from her custody unlawfully. The petition was denied. On appeal, the mother cited In re Bertelson, 189 M 524, 617 P2d 121 (1980), for the proposition that a writ of habeas corpus was the appropriate procedural device to bring the custody matter before a court. The Supreme Court disagreed and distinguished Bertelson because the mother's position ignored the substantial differences between dissolution proceedings and abuse and neglect proceedings, differences that were not at issue in Bertelson. The court also cited its earlier holding in In re B.P. & A.P., 2000 MT 39, 298 M 287, 995 P2d 982 (2000), in which it was held that the children were properly removed from the mother's home. Because temporary custody of the children with the state was legal, relief pursuant to habeas corpus premised on illegal restraint was not available to the mother under these circumstances. In re B.P. & A.P., 2001 MT 219, 306 M 430, 35 P3d 291 (2001).

Denial of Writ of Habeas Corpus to Compel Attendance of Children in Abuse and Neglect Hearing Not Violative of Due Process Rights or Right to Confront Witnesses: The mother petitioned the District Court for a writ of habeas corpus demanding that her children be physically present for an abuse and neglect hearing because they were material witnesses and claiming that the writ was necessary to ensure her due process rights by having the children available to rebut allegations against her at the hearing. The petition was denied. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Although the mother was entitled to an opportunity for a meaningful hearing, that opportunity need not be provided at the expense of the children whose best interests were the paramount focus of the proceeding, and subjecting the children to direct and cross-examination could exacerbate the abuse that they had already experienced. Denial of the petition did not violate the mother's right to confront witnesses because the children were not her accusers and she had no right to confront them. Rather, the abuse and neglect case was brought by the state, and the mother had ample opportunity to confront and examine the state's witnesses and experts at the hearing, so her due process rights were met. In re B.P. & A.P., 2001 MT 219, 306 M 430, 35 P3d 291 (2001).

Parties in Dissolution Proceeding Not Same as Parties in Abuse and Neglect Proceeding — Res Judicata Inapplicable: During marriage dissolution proceedings, the mother was granted custody of the children, but during a subsequent abuse and neglect proceeding, permanent custody was granted to the father. The mother appealed the placement on grounds that it constituted a readjudication of the earlier custody order in her favor in the dissolution action, in violation of the doctrine of res judicata. The Supreme Court disagreed. Four criteria must be met for res judicata to apply, the first of which is that the parties or their privies are the same. The mother failed to meet this criteria because in the dissolution action, the parties were the mother and father, while in the abuse and neglect proceeding, the parties were the state, the children, and the mother. Despite the fact that the state was investigating claims of abuse within the family during the dissolution action, it was not a party to that action and did not petition for investigative authority and protective services (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427) for the children until the dissolution was final. In re B.P. & A.P., 2001 MT 219, 306 M 430, 35 P3d 291 (2001).

Parent Not Represented by Counsel During Show Cause Hearing Regarding Whether Child a Youth in Need of Care — Due Process Rights Not Violated: At the time of a show cause hearing on whether her child was a youth in need of care, the mother was an indigent mental patient civilly committed to the state hospital. She appeared at the hearing without representation of counsel. The mother contended that the District Court violated her due process rights by making that critical determination regarding the child when she was unrepresented. Although in In re A.S.A., J.L.A., G.A., & A.J.A., 258 M 194, 852 P2d 127 (1993), the Supreme Court held that the constitutional right to due process guarantees an indigent parent the right to court-appointed counsel in parental rights termination proceedings, the court has not extended the right to counsel to a pretermination proceeding in which the focal issue is whether a child is a youth in need of care. Rather, appointment of counsel at any time prior to the initiation of termination proceedings is within the discretion of the District Court. In this case, the initial determination that the child was a youth in need of care was made by order pursuant to a finding of probable cause even before the mother's first appearance in any proceedings when the District Court relied on a report submitted by a social worker showing that the child was abused or neglected or in danger of abuse or neglect and that removal from the home was necessary to protect the child's welfare. Subsequent to the initial determination, the District Court reached the same conclusion on at least three separate occasions when the mother was represented by counsel, including one hearing when the social worker was subjected to cross-examination by the mother's counsel. The Supreme Court applied In re M.F., 201 M 277, 653 P2d 1205 (1982), and in re D.S., H.S., R.S., R.S., J.S., R.S., & K.S., 253 M 484, 833 P2d 1090 (1992), and in holding that the state is not required to provide counsel at proceedings concerning temporary investigative authority or temporary custody. Thus, the mother's due process rights were not violated when the District Court made the determination that the child was a youth in need of care at a time when the mother was not represented by counsel. (See 2005 amendment.) In re A.M., 2001 MT 60, 304 M 379, 22 P3d 185 (2001).

Retroactive Application of Amendment: Subsection (2) of 41-3-401 (renumbered 41-3-422) was amended in 1985 to require adjudicatory hearing within 20 days of filing of petition but was amended in 1987 to remove the 20-day requirement. Hearing in this case was held after effective date of 1985 amendment but not within 20 days of filing petition. Appellant contended 1985 amendment was procedural and applied retroactively to require hearing within 20 days. The Supreme Court, citing Boehm v. Alanon Club, 222 M 373, 722 P2d 1160, 43 St. Rep. 1341 (1986), held that even though this provision may be procedural and therefore not subject to 1-2-109 (which states no law is retroactive unless expressly so declared), the 1987 amendment was likewise retroactive and therefore voided the 20-day requirement. Custody of R.A.D., 44 St. Rep. 2018 (1987). Opinion withdrawn but issue affirmed in Custody of R.A.D. & J.D., 231 M 143, 753 P2d 862, 45 St. Rep. 496 (1988).

Evidence of Sexual Abuse — Treatment Plan Ordered: Acting on evidence of sexual abuse and other problems within the family, the trial court properly found S.L.T. to be an abused and neglected child. The court granted temporary custody to the county welfare department and required that the child and her parents follow a treatment plan submitted by the welfare department. Section 41-3-404 (renumbered 41-3-437) gives the trial court authority to order any of the forms of relief listed in 41-3-403 (renumbered 41-3-423) once the court determines a child is abused or neglected. This includes the relief ordered in this case. In re S.L.T., 215 M 289, 697 P2d 472, 42 St. Rep. 366 (1985).

Failure to Serve Natural Father — Mother's Lack of Standing to Contest: In a youth in need of care proceeding, the mother has no standing to contest the failure to serve the natural father when she has not shown a personal interest that would be adversely affected by such failure to serve. In re B.L.O., 213 M 164, 689 P2d 1246, 41 St. Rep. 2024 (1984).

Finding of Abuse, Neglect, or Dependency Necessary Before Consideration of Best Interests of the Child: M.G.M. was born out of wedlock and had little contact with her natural father until the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Family Services) placed M.G.M. in a foster home and terminated her mother's parental rights. The Department then sought to terminate the father's parental rights. To terminate his parental rights, the court must first find that the child is abused, neglected, or dependent. Only when such a finding has been made can the court apply the best interests of the child test. In re M.G.M., 201 M 400, 654 P2d 994, 39 St. Rep. 2191 (1982).

Matter Submitted With Petition: The Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (SRS) (now Department of Family Services) first had contact with the mother of three minor children in 1967. During the period from 1976 through 1981, SRS received numerous complaints alleging abuse and neglect of the children. In 1981, proceedings were begun to terminate the mother's parental rights. The mother contended that the submission of a social worker's report to the court, along with the petition for permanent custody, was error. The Supreme Court held that where the report contained information essentially the same as that testified to by the author, who was cross-examined at the hearing, there is a presumption that the trial court has disregarded all inadmissible material in making its decision. The decision of the lower court was upheld. In re M.F., J.F., & R.W., 201 M 277, 653 P2d 1205, 39 St. Rep. 2103 (1982).

Interval Between Removal and Final Order: Although the interval of 20 months between the time of removal from the home until the final order was long and District Courts are exhorted to give preference to custody cases, reversal here would be an ill-advised and improper sanction because of the best interests of the child. In re A.J.S., 193 M 79, 630 P2d 217, 38 St. Rep. 947 (1981). (Annotator's note: Chapter 659, sec. 5, L. 1985, amended 41-3-401 (renumbered 41-3-422) and 41-3-404 (renumbered 41-3-437) to require that the 41-3-404 (renumbered 41-3-437) adjudicatory hearing must be held within 20 days of the filing of the petition and the 41-3-406 (renumbered 41-3-438) dispositional hearing must be held within 30 days of the adjudicatory hearing. Chapter 388, sec. 2, L. 1985, amended 41-3-607 to require that a dispositional hearing on a petition to terminate parental rights must be held within 180 days of the filing of the petition.)

Names of Parties: The Supreme Court directed that in this and in future cases under 41-3-101, et seq., in both the District and Supreme Courts, all names of parties involved be removed to avoid publicity of the minor parties involved. In re G., Youth in Need of Care, 174 M 321, 570 P2d 1110 (1977).

Failure to Make Required Findings: The District Court abused its discretion in awarding permanent custody to the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Family Services) because it patently failed to make the required findings that the child was "abused, dependent, or neglected" and therefore was without power to effect a permanent transfer of custody to a nonparent. In re Fish, 174 M 201, 569 P2d 924 (1977).

Hearsay in Child Custody Procedure: The Montana Rules of Civil Procedure, including the hearsay rule, must be strictly followed in a child custody procedure to avoid abuse. Therefore, Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Family Services) reports containing hearsay that are not excepted from the rule as either business records or written reports by state officers are inadmissible. In re Swan, 173 M 311, 567 P2d 898 (1977).

Prehearing Report — Petition for Permanent Custody: The Supreme Court avoided deciding whether or not it is proper for a County Attorney to file a prehearing report in support of a petition under 41-3-401 (renumbered 41-3-422) for permanent custody since the only report in the record was filed in support of a temporary investigative authority and protective services (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427) petition under 41-3-402(3) (renumbered 41-3-427(3)). In re Moyer, 173 M 208, 567 P2d 47 (1977).

Temporary Custody: When petitioners had requested temporary custody of neglected children and no petition had been filed by the welfare department for permanent custody, the District Court was without authority to enter an order of permanent custody. Flathead County Welfare Dept. v. Endres, 166 M 379, 533 P2d 959 (1975).

JURISDICTION

Termination of Parental Rights — Requirements of Indian Child Welfare Act: Under the Indian Child Welfare Act of 1978, 25 U.S.C. 1901, et seq., the party seeking termination of an individual's parental rights to an Indian child under state law must satisfy the court that active efforts have been made to provide remedial services and rehabilitative programs designed to prevent the breakup of the Indian family and that the efforts have proved unsuccessful. The party seeking termination has the burden of proving beyond a reasonable doubt that the continued custody of the child by the parent or Indian custodian is likely to result in serious emotional or physical damage to the child. In re Custody of A.L.R., A.A.R., & T.C.R., 2002 MT 183, 311 M 76, 54 P3d 17 (2002).

Failure to Personally Serve Notice of Child Custody Proceedings to Parent Incarcerated Out-of-State Not Reversible Error: The father was incarcerated in Washington state and was notified by mail of proceedings prior to the filing of a petition for permanent legal custody and termination of parental rights regarding his children, rather than by personal service. He contended that failure to serve notice personally was reversible error. The Supreme Court disagreed. Although the preferred practice is to personally serve parents and legal guardians whose whereabouts are known with copies of all petitions in accordance with this section, the issue of personal service was not dispositive in this case. Because the father was incarcerated at all times during the proceedings, it would have been impossible for him to exercise his legal rights to parent the children during that time. He was unable to show how personal service would have significantly impacted the proceedings or how invalidation of the proceedings would have a significant impact on his parental rights. Therefore, failure to personally serve the father with notice of the proceedings prior to filing the petition for permanent legal custody was not reversible error. In re L.M.A.T. & B.L.F.T., 2002 MT 163, 310 M 422, 51 P3d 504 (2002).

2001 Notice Provisions Not Applicable to Proceedings Begun in 2000: The 2001 Legislature amended this section to require that parents or legal guardians be advised of their right to counsel and the right to contest the proceedings. The amendments also require that when a District Court issues an order in an abuse and neglect proceeding, it must include notice concerning statutory requirements for timeliness of hearings and presumptions of the best interests of the child and that completion of a treatment plan does not guarantee return of a child. The order issued in this case in 2002 did not contain the mandated notices, so a parent contended that the order was invalid and unenforceable. However, the proceedings in this case were begun before the 2001 amendments were adopted, so pursuant to the saving clause in the 2001 act, the notice requirements did not apply. In re L.M.A.T. & B.L.F.T., 2002 MT 163, 310 M 422, 51 P3d 504 (2002).

Expiration of Temporary Custody Order — No Effect on Jurisdiction: At the time that the Department of Family Services filed a petition for temporary investigative authority (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427), the mother and her children were not living on the reservation. Subsequently, the mother moved back to the reservation and sought to have the action transferred to the tribal court. The mother argued that the District Court had lost jurisdiction over the matter when its order of temporary custody expired. The Supreme Court ruled that the child abuse and neglect statutes do not make provisions for the expiration of custody in the state or for the loss of jurisdiction by the court, other than by a finding by the court that the children are not in danger of being abused or neglected and by vacating any order made pursuant to 41-3-403 (renumbered 41-3-423). In re W.L., C.L., & B.L., 260 M 325, 859 P2d 1019, 50 St. Rep. 1081 (1993).

Jurisdiction Respecting Indian Children — Domicile at Time Action Commenced: At the time that the Department of Family Services filed a petition for temporary investigative authority (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427), the mother and her children were not living on the reservation. Subsequently, the mother moved back to the reservation and sought to have the action transferred to the tribal court. The Supreme Court held that domicile is determined at the commencement of an action and that the lower court had jurisdiction based on the fact that the mother and her children were not living on the reservation when the petition was filed. In re W.L., C.L., & B.L., 260 M 325, 859 P2d 1019, 50 St. Rep. 1081 (1993).

Lack of Personal Notice — Due Process Not Violated: Mother abandoned her children after two failed treatment plans and neglected to apprise the Department of Family Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) of her whereabouts for over 90 days prior to initiation of termination proceedings, during which time Department efforts to contact her were unsuccessful. Relying on 41-3-401 (renumbered 41-3-422), she later argued that because she was not personally served with notice of the termination proceedings, her due process rights were violated. However, 41-3-608 outlines the notice requirements applicable to parent-child relationship termination proceedings. The District Court, after noting the Department's efforts to locate mother and the fact that she was under actual notice from the onset of Department involvement that her parental rights could be terminated if she failed to follow court-ordered treatment plans, properly held that the notice requirements of 41-3-608 were satisfied. In re A.E., C.E., S.R., & J.R., 255 M 56, 840 P2d 572, 49 St. Rep. 877 (1992).

Failure to Transfer Jurisdiction of Eskimo Child to Alaska Tribe Proper — Application of Indian Child Welfare Act: The District Court denied an Eskimo tribe's motion to transfer jurisdiction of child custody proceedings of an Eskimo child under the Indian Child Welfare Act of 1978. The Supreme Court found that denial of the motion was proper under the rationale of 25 U.S.C. 1911(a) and (b) and the previous ruling in In re M.E.M., 195 M 329, 635 P2d 1313 (1981). The child was not residing or domiciled within the tribal reservation. Further, good cause existed for retaining jurisdiction in Montana rather than transferring jurisdiction to Alaska, including evidence of potentially devastating damage to the child's best interests and stability, as well as undue hardship on parties and witnesses. In re T.S., 245 M 242, 801 P2d 77, 47 St. Rep. 2149 (1990), replacing previous opinion, subsequently withdrawn, at 47 St. Rep. 1888.

Refusal to Relinquish Custody of Indian Children to Tribe — No Abuse of Discretion: Although a tribe participated in the dispositional hearing and presented a formal resolution asking for custody of the children, who were tribal members, the District Court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to relinquish custody to the tribe when it was determined that the children's best interests would be better served by leaving them in their foster home placement, with the ultimate goal of placing them in a Native American home. In re M.J.D., C.K.D., & A.R.D., 225 M 200, 731 P2d 937, 44 St. Rep. 167 (1987).

Transfer of Child Proceeding From Montana Court to Tribal Court — Due Process Requirements: One of the purposes of the Indian Child Welfare Act, 25 U.S.C. §1901, et seq., is to ensure due process for all those involved, which requires a Montana court, when entertaining a tribal court motion for transfer to the tribal court of jurisdiction of children who are the subject of a Montana court proceeding, to hold a hearing on the transfer request and give a parent who claims indigency an appointed counsel if the court finds indigency. In re G.L.O.C., Youth in Need of Care, 205 M 352, 668 P2d 235, 40 St. Rep. 1354 (1983).

Parental Consent Not Required: Parental consent is not a jurisdictional necessity under this chapter to declare a child abused, dependent, or neglected or to grant permanent custody of the child to persons other than the natural parents. In re C.M.S., A Dependent and Neglected Child, 187 M 115, 609 P2d 240 (1979).

Jurisdiction Dependent on Statutory Compliance: In a consolidated proceeding based on a petition for a Writ of Habeas Corpus by a natural parent and a petition by a nonparent for guardianship, the District Court was without jurisdiction to find the children involved dependent and neglected and to enter an order granting custody to the nonparent petitioners. Unless 41-3-401 (renumbered 41-3-422) is followed, the court is without jurisdiction to deprive the parent of custody. In re the Marriage of Schultz v. Schultz, 184 M 245, 602 P2d 595 (1979), following Guardianship of Aschenbrenner, 182 M 540, 597 P2d 1156 (1979), and Guardianship of Evans, 179 M 438, 587 P2d 372 (1978).

Jurisdiction Based on Service: Under section 10-504, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed), District Court had jurisdiction over petition by state seeking permanent custody and right to consent to adoption of three children despite the facts that proper citation was not issued or served on the parents, when father of one of the children had consented to the proceeding, father of other two children was deceased, mother who was represented by counsel appeared at the hearing voluntarily, and the hearing on the petition in question was preceded by a series of hearings and postponements regarding temporary custody of the children. Bonser v. Cascade County, 162 M 1, 507 P2d 1064 (1973).

Jurisdiction Over Indians: Under section 10-503, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed), when child was taken from Indian reservation and abandoned outside the reservation, court for the county where the child was found could take jurisdiction and provide for the child despite the fact that the mother remained on the reservation and committed no acts of neglect outside the reservation. In re Cantrell, 159 M 66, 495 P2d 179 (1972).

FACTORS TO BE CONSIDERED

Sufficient Evidence to Adjudicate Children as Youths in Need of Care: The District Court properly adjudicated children as youths in need of care based on evidence that: (1) there was a significant prior history of domestic violence and domestic abuse between the parents in the presence of the children; (2) one of the children exhibited various behavior and developmental problems, including running away, violent behavior, anger control problems, and poor language skills; (3) the father could not care for the children because of his long-term federal incarceration; (4) the mother, who was living at a shelter for domestic abuse victims and dealing with mental health issues, had voluntarily surrendered the children to state care because of her inability to adequately parent them; and (5) the state had made reasonable efforts to avoid placement of the children or to make it possible to safely return the children to the home, but protective placement was required. In re B.S. & G.S., 2009 MT 98, 350 M 86, 206 P3d 565 (2009).

Misdiagnosis — Evidence at Time of TIA Hearing Sufficient for Issuance of TIA: After the parents' 4-year-old daughter was diagnosed as a probable victim of parental sexual misconduct, the court ordered a TIA and protective services for all five children, who were all under 5 years of age. The parents' rights were eventually terminated. Two years after the initial diagnosis, it was determined that the daughter's physical symptoms were the result of a rare skin disease called lichens sclerosis et atrophicus (LSA) rather than sexual abuse. Subsequent discovery that the initial probable cause determination was based on faulty information does not change the fact that the District Court initially had probable cause based upon information available at the time of the determination. Substantial, credible evidence supported the District Court's finding of probable cause for issuing the TIA. In re D.B., 2004 MT 371, 325 M 13, 103 P3d 1026 (2004).

Termination of Parental Rights: When the following things were considered, the record supported the conclusion that the father's rights were adequately considered prior to termination of parental rights and that the decision to terminate them was supported by credible evidence: (1) the father was notified of the hearing, was present, and was represented by counsel; (2) professional testimony indicated the father would not be able to provide enough influence to offset the marked deprivation anticipated to continue for the child; (3) the father was found to have made no effort to assist the mother in learning to become a good parent; (4) the father had visited the child only once in 6 months when the child was in a foster home and had been reported to have abused the child. In re L.F.G., 183 M 239, 598 P2d 1125 (1979).

Youth in Need — Best Interest of Child — Mental Condition of Parent as Sole Factor: When the District Court considered the best interests of a child only after first determining that the child was in fact abused or neglected, it met the required standard. Considering the mental condition of the mother as the primary if not the sole factor, but having evidence that the child would not receive even minimally satisfactory maternal care and would be exposed to extremely high chances of developing a mental condition similar to that of the mother, sufficient credible evidence was before the District Court to support the District Court's decision that the child was a youth in need of care. The Supreme Court rejected the view that mental condition of a parent could not be the sole factor supporting a severance of parental rights. In re L.F.G., 183 M 239, 598 P2d 1125 (1979).

APPOINTMENT OF GUARDIAN OR COUNSEL

Appointed Counsel — Termination of Parental Rights — Factors Considered: The Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (SRS) (now Department of Family Services) first had contact with the mother of three minor children in 1967. During the period from 1976 through 1981, SRS received numerous complaints alleging abuse and neglect of the children. In 1980, SRS filed a petition for temporary investigative authority (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427) regarding the children. In 1981, judgment was entered terminating the mother's parental rights. On appeal, the mother contended that the District Court erred in failing to appoint counsel for her at the time the application for temporary investigative authority (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427) was filed. The Supreme Court, relying on Lassiter v. Dept. of Social Services, 452 US 18 (1981), held that appointed counsel is required if the factors enumerated in Mathews v. Eldridge, 424 US 319, 47 L Ed 2d 18, 96 S Ct 893 (1976), outweigh the presumption against appointment of counsel. The factors to be considered are the private interests, the government's interest, and the risk of erroneous decision. The court found that the mother's due process rights were adequately protected by having counsel appointed prior to the hearings for termination of her parental rights and resting permanent custody in the Department (now Department of Family Services). (See 2005 amendment.) In re M.F., J.F., & R.W., 201 M 277, 653 P2d 1205, 39 St. Rep. 2103 (1982), followed in In re A.B., 239 M 344, 780 P2d 622, 46 St. Rep. 1734 (1989), and in In re T.C. & R.C., 240 M 308, 784 P2d 392, 46 St. Rep. 2148 (1989).

Appointment of Counsel — Indian Child Welfare Act: In a proceeding for termination of parental rights in a dependency and neglect action involving a Sioux Indian child, the District Court was required to apply the Indian Child Welfare Act (25 U.S.C.A. §§1901-1963). The mother of the child was indigent and had an IQ of 53. Counsel should have been appointed under the Indian Child Welfare Act and 41-3-401 (renumbered 41-3-422), even though not requested. The Supreme Court held that it was reversible error not to appoint counsel for the mother, particularly in light of her indigency and IQ level. In re M.E.M., 195 M 329, 635 P2d 1313, 38 St. Rep. 1895 (1981).

Child and Indigent Parents' Right to Appointed Counsel: When indigent parents are involved in dependency proceedings, the District Court must make a judicial decision in each case as to whether such parents are entitled to counsel appointed by the court whenever the indigent parent, unable to present his or her case properly, faces a substantial possibility of the loss of custody or prolonged separation from the child. The factors which the District Court may consider in determining whether to appoint such counsel will vary from case to case, but should the District Court refuse a request for counsel, the grounds for refusal must be stated in the record so that meaningful judicial review of the refusal can be had. The same is true for children involved in the proceedings. (See 2005 amendment.) In re M.D.Y.R., Youth in Need of Care, 177 M 521, 582 P2d 758 (1978), following Cleaver v. Wilcox, 499 F2d 940 (9th Cir. 1974).

Appointment of Counsel: Only in cases heard and decided after Gullette, 173 M 132, 566 P2d 396 (1977) (overruled in McDowell v. McDowell, 263 M 252, 868 P2d 1250, 51 St. Rep. 42 (1994)), is a finding on the appointment of counsel for a minor child required. Further, appointment of counsel is only necessary when the child needs an advocate to represent his position as to the issues in dispute or to ensure the development of an adequately complete record concerning his best interests. (See 2005 amendment.) In re Inquiry Into J.J.S., Youth in Need of Care, 176 M 202, 577 P2d 378 (1978).

Adequate Representation in Neglect Case: County Department of Welfare adequately and properly represented children in neglect proceeding. Judge exercised discretion and did not err in failing to appoint counsel. (See 2005 amendment.) Stubben v. Dept. of Public Welfare, 171 M 111, 556 P2d 904 (1976).

Attorney General's Opinions

Child Abuse, Neglect, and Dependency Proceedings — Duty of County Attorney: It is the duty of the County Attorney to represent the Department of Family Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) in child abuse, neglect, and dependency proceedings brought under Title 41, ch. 3. 42 A.G. Op. 45 (1987).

Authority to Prevent Withholding of Treatment: The Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) has authority to initiate legal proceedings to prevent the withholding of medically indicated treatment for disabled infants with life-threatening conditions under the 1985 amendments to the child abuse, neglect, and dependency statutes. 41 A.G. Op. 85 (1986).

Disclosure of Case Records and Reports of Child Abuse and Neglect: Absent a court order, 41-3-205 prohibits the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) from disclosing case records and reports of child abuse and neglect to: (1) the natural parents or parent or other person having legal custody of a child who is the subject of a dependency and neglect action filed under 41-3-401 (renumbered 41-3-422); (2) health care professionals who are treating a child suspected of being abused or neglected; (3) the noncustodial parent of a child who has been removed from the custodial parent following an incident of abuse or neglect; and (4) the natural parents or parent or other person having legal custody of a child who has been abused or neglected while in the care of foster parents. 41 A.G. Op. 49 (1986).

County Power — "4-C's": Counties, jointly with the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services), may contract with local "4-C's" projects to provide coordination and support of child abuse prevention and treatment services. 37 A.G. Op. 105 (1978).

Law Review Articles

Race, Poverty, and Neglect, Charlow, 28 Wm. Mitchell L. Rev. 763 (2001).

41-3-423. Reasonable efforts required to prevent removal of child or to return — exemption — findings — permanency plan.

Compiler's Comments

2007 Amendment: Chapter 166 in (5) near middle after "efforts" inserted "including consideration of both in-state and out-of-state permanent placement options for the child"; in (6) near end of first sentence after "plan" inserted "including, if appropriate, placement in another state" and near middle of third sentence after "planning" inserted "including identifying in-state and out-of-state placements"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 2007.

2005 Amendment: Chapter 449 in (2) in second sentence after first "counsel" inserted requirement for court to immediately provide for appointment or assignment of counsel, after second "counsel" deleted "must be appointed by the court at the time that a request is made for a determination under this subsection", and inserted reference to representation of indigent parent in accordance with 41-3-425. Amendment effective April 28, 2005.

Saving Clause: Section 78, Ch. 449, L. 2005, was a saving clause.

2003 Amendment: Chapter 555 in (1) near middle of second sentence inserted reference to voluntary protective services agreements and at end deleted "The court shall review the services provided by the agency"; and inserted (7) relating to court review of the department's reasonable efforts to prevent removal of a child. Amendment effective October 1, 2003.

2001 Amendments — Composite Section — Coordination: Chapter 83 in (1)(b) in first sentence after "served" deleted "pursuant to the Montana Rules of Civil Procedure" and after "order" inserted "as provided in 41-3-428 and 41-3-429"; and in (6)(e) inserted "including the name and address of a putative father, as defined in 42-2-201, for the purpose of obtaining service of process in the proceeding". Amendment effective March 20, 2001. The amendment by Ch. 281 rendered the amendment by Ch. 83 void.

Chapter 281 deleted former (1) and (2) that read: "(1) (a) Upon the filing of a petition for temporary investigative authority and protective services, the court, after consideration of the parents' statements, if any, included with the petition and any accompanying affidavit or report to the court, may issue an order granting relief that may be required for the immediate protection of the youth.

(b) The order, along with the petition and supporting documents, must be served pursuant to the Montana Rules of Civil Procedure on the person or persons named in the order. When the youth is placed in a medical facility or protective facility, the department shall notify the parents or parent, guardian, or other person having legal custody of the youth, at the time the placement is made or as soon after placement as possible.

(c) The order must require the person served to comply immediately with the terms of the order and to appear before the court issuing the order on the date specified for a show cause hearing. The show cause hearing must be conducted within 20 days of the issuance of the order by the judge or a master appointed by the judge. The person filing the petition has the burden of presenting evidence establishing probable cause for the issuance of the order. At the show cause hearing, the court shall provide an opportunity for a parent or guardian, if present, and any other person having relevant knowledge to provide relevant testimony. The court may consider all relevant evidence in accordance with the rules of civil procedure as modified by this part, but may in its discretion limit testimony and evidence to only that which is relevant to the issues of removal from the home and the child's need for continued protection. The court may amend the order. Except as otherwise provided in this part, the rules of civil procedure apply. Hearsay evidence of statements made by the affected youth is admissible at the hearing or at a contested case proceeding held pursuant to Title 2, chapter 4, part 6, that results from adverse licensing action taken by the department.

(d) If the child is not returned home after the show cause hearing, the person served may request that a local citizen review board, if available pursuant to part 10, review the case within 30 days of the show cause hearing and make a recommendation to the district court, as provided in 41-3-1010.

(e) Upon a failure to comply or show cause, the court may hold the person in contempt or place temporary physical custody of the youth with the department until further order.

(2) At the conclusion of a show cause hearing, in an order granting or denying relief, the court shall make a finding regarding the reasonableness of agency efforts to prevent the child's removal from the home or to make it possible to safely return the child to the child's home. In determining preservation or reunification services to be provided and in making reasonable efforts at providing preservation or reunification services, the child's health and safety are of paramount concern"; inserted (1) requiring reasonable efforts to prevent the necessity of removal of a child from the child's home and to reunify families that have been separated by the state; in (2) inserted first two sentences allowing the department to request a determination that preservation or reunification services need not be provided and providing for appointment of counsel for indigent parents; inserted (4) requiring that a finding that preservation or reunification services are not necessary be supported by clear and convincing evidence; in (5) near beginning inserted reference to subsection (3); deleted former (6) through (9) that read: "(6) The court may grant the following kinds of relief:

(a) right of entry by a peace officer or department worker;

(b) medical and psychological evaluation of the youth or parents, guardians, or person having physical or legal custody;

(c) requirement that the youth, parents, guardians, or person having physical or legal custody receive counseling services;

(d) placement of the youth in a temporary medical facility or a facility for protection of the youth;

(e) requirement that the parents, guardian, or other person having physical or legal custody furnish information that the court may designate;

(f) inquiry into the financial ability of the parents, guardian, or other person having custody of the youth to contribute to the costs for the care, custody, and treatment of the youth and requirement of a contribution for those costs pursuant to the requirements of 41-3-411; or

(g) other temporary disposition that may be required in the best interests of the youth that does not require an expenditure of money by the department unless the department is notified and a court hearing is set in a timely manner on the proposed expenditure. The department is the payor of last resort after all family, insurance, and other resources have been examined.

(7) An order for temporary investigative authority and protective services may not be issued for a period longer than 90 days following the show cause hearing and must be limited to one extension of 90 days. Before the expiration of the time provided for in an order for temporary investigative authority and protective services, the county attorney, the attorney general, or an attorney hired by the county shall file a petition for one of the following:

(a) limited emancipation;

(b) temporary legal custody;

(c) termination of the parent-child legal relationship and permanent legal custody with the right to consent to adoption; or

(d) dismissal.

(8) Notwithstanding the above time limits, the court may continue an order for temporary investigative authority pending a hearing on a petition provided for in subsection (7).

(9) If the time limitations of this section are not met, the court shall review the reasons for the failure and order an appropriate remedy that considers the best interests of the child"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2001.

Chapter 311 throughout (1) substituted references to a child for references to a youth; in (1)(c) near middle substituted reference to Montana Rules of Evidence for reference to rules of civil procedure and deleted former next-to-last sentence that read: "Except as otherwise provided in this part, the rules of civil procedure apply"; in (6) at end inserted last sentence referring to concurrent planning; in (7) at end of first sentence deleted "and must be limited to one extension of 90 days"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2001. The amendment by Ch. 281 rendered the amendment by Ch. 311, other than the insertion of the sentence in (6) referring to concurrent planning, void.

The amendment to subsection (6) of this section made by sec. 9, Ch. 311, L. 2001, was rendered void by sec. 18(3), Ch. 281, L. 2001, a coordination section.

Saving Clause: Section 8, Ch. 83, L. 2001, was a saving clause.

Section 19, Ch. 281, L. 2001, was a saving clause.

1999 Amendment: Chapter 566 near beginning of (1)(b) substituted "served pursuant to the Montana Rules of Civil Procedure" for "served by a peace officer or a representative of the department"; in (2) at beginning of first sentence inserted "At the conclusion of a show cause hearing", after "agency efforts to" deleted "rehabilitate the family to", and end inserted "or to make it possible to safely return the child to the child's home" and inserted last two sentences and (2)(a) through (2)(e) providing that child's health and safety are paramount concern in determining preservation and reunification services to be provided and establishing criteria for when reasonable efforts to provide preservation or reunification services are not required; inserted (3) establishing criteria for when preservation or reunification services are not required for putative father; inserted (4) requiring permanency hearing within 30 days of finding that preservation or reunification services are not necessary; inserted (5) requiring department to make reasonable efforts to permanently place child if court determines efforts to return child to home are inconsistent with permanency plan and allowing permanent placement efforts to be conducted concurrently with efforts to return child to home; in (6)(e) substituted "furnish information" for "furnish services"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 1999.

1997 Amendments: Chapter 501 in (1)(a), near middle, inserted "after consideration of the parents' statements, if any, included with the petition and any accompanying affidavit or report to the court". Amendment effective May 2, 1997.

Chapter 516 in (1)(c), in first sentence after "terms of the order", substituted "and" for "or" and at end substituted "for a show cause hearing" for "and show cause why the person has not complied with the order" and inserted fourth through sixth sentences regarding evidence at the show cause hearing and the court's ability to amend an order; inserted (1)(d) regarding case review by a local citizen review board; in (1)(e), near middle after "temporary", substituted "physical" for "legal"; inserted (2) requiring a finding regarding the reasonableness of agency efforts; in (3)(b) and (3)(c), after "having", inserted "physical or"; in (3)(e), after "having", inserted "physical or legal"; in (3)(f), at end, substituted "41-3-411" for "41-3-406(3) through (6)"; in (3)(g), near beginning of first sentence after "best", substituted "interests" for "interest"; inserted (4) limiting an order for temporary investigative authority; inserted (5) regarding continuance of an order for temporary investigative authority; and inserted (6) requiring the court to review reasons why time limits have not been met and order an appropriate remedy.

Applicability: Section 20, Ch. 516, L. 1997, provided that this section applies to proceedings commenced on or after October 1, 1997.

1995 Amendment: Chapter 458 in (1)(c), in last sentence, inserted final clause regarding contested case hearing resulting from adverse licensing action. Amendment effective April 14, 1995.

1993 Amendments — Composite Section: Chapter 112 at end of (1)(c) inserted "Hearsay evidence of statements made by the affected youth is admissible at the hearing"; and made minor changes in style.

Chapter 362 throughout section, after "department", deleted "of family services"; in (2)(g), at end after "youth", inserted "that does not require an expenditure of money by the department unless the department is notified and a court hearing is set in a timely manner on the proposed expenditure. The department is the payor of last resort after all family, insurance, and other resources have been examined"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 16, 1993.

In the phrase "Except as otherwise provided herein", Ch. 112, near end of (1)(c) changed "herein" to "in this part" and Ch. 362 changed "herein" to "in this section". The codifier used "in this part" because it is the broader reference.

1991 Amendment: Inserted (2)(f) allowing a court to inquire into the financial ability of parent, guardian, or custodian to contribute to costs for care, custody, and treatment of a youth and to order contribution for those costs. Amendment effective July 1, 1991.

1987 Amendment: Substituted "department of family services" for "department of social and rehabilitation services".

1985 Amendment: In (1)(b), near beginning after "order", inserted "along with the petition and supporting documents", and inserted second sentence requiring the Department to notify parents or guardians when youth is placed in medical facility or protective facility; and in (1)(c), in first sentence, near middle after "terms thereof or", deleted "upon failure to so comply", and inserted second and third sentences requiring a show cause hearing within 20 days of protection order and requiring the petitioner to present evidence establishing probable cause for the protective order.

Case Notes

Department's Reunification Efforts Held Reasonable — Termination of Parental Rights Over Siblings Held Sufficient Justification — No Abuse of Discretion: After the District Court terminated a mother's parental rights over her child C.J., the mother appealed, claiming as unreasonable the 4 ½ months that passed between the petition by the Department of Public Health and Human Services (Department) to be exempted from the "reasonable efforts" for reunification requirement under 41-3-423(2)(e), because the mother's rights over C.J.'s two siblings had also been terminated, and the date of the hearing. The Supreme Court held that the Department's efforts were reasonable notwithstanding the Department's petition, that there was no timeline provided in the statutes for the hearing, that the delay in holding the hearing did not subject the mother to a fundamentally unfair proceeding, and that the mother was correctly not given a treatment plan because her circumstances met the requirements of 41-3-609(1)(d) and 41-3-423(2)(e) regarding termination of a mother's rights over one child because her rights over other siblings were previously terminated. Therefore, the Supreme Court held that there was no abuse of discretion by the District Court in terminating the mother's parental rights over C.J. In re C.J., 2010 MT 179, 357 Mont. 219, 237 P.3d 1282.

Proper Consideration of Circumstances of Prior Involuntary Termination of Parental Rights — Clear and Convincing Evidence to Support Termination of Rights to Subsequent Child: The parents contended that there was no clear and convincing evidence to support termination of their parental rights to A.H.D. based on the prior involuntary termination of their rights to two other children. The Supreme Court disagreed. The District Court did not err in relying on relevant testimony presented at earlier hearings and incorporating earlier findings based on evidence presented at those hearings. The court correctly considered that the circumstances related to the prior termination were ongoing and relevant to the parents' ability to adequately care for A.H.D. Thus, the District Court did not abuse its discretion in terminating the parents' rights to A.H.D. In re A.H.D., 2008 MT 57, 341 M 494, 178 P3d 131 (2008).

Sufficient Evidence to Terminate Rights of Incarcerated Parent: The District Court did not abuse its discretion in terminating the parental rights of an incarcerated parent after citing: (1) the fact that the child would have been in foster placement for more than 15 of the most recent months before the parent was eligible for parole, thus satisfying the presumption in 43-1-604(1); (2) the parent's criminal history, including seven prior felonies and four sentence revocations; (3) the parent's history of voluntary underemployment, despite the parent's asserted wish to support the child; (4) the parent's failure to establish a substantial relationship with the child through visits or regular contact; (5) the failure of the parent to manifest an ability to assume legal and physical custody because of incarceration; (6) the child's need for immediate permanent placement in order to meet the child's developmental, cognitive, and psychological stability needs; and (7) the inability of the parent to provide for immediate placement because of incarceration. The parent appealed on grounds that the District Court improperly relied on the presumption in 41-3-604(1). The Supreme Court agreed that the presumption was not satisfied because the child had not been in foster care for the requisite amount of time. However, the court noted that parental rights may properly be terminated if the District Court correctly relies on any one basis set out in 41-3-609. In this case, the District Court correctly relied on several bases other than the statutory presumption and thus did not abuse its discretion in terminating the parent's rights. In re M.P., 2008 MT 39, 341 M 333, 177 P3d 495 (2008).

Evidence of Parent's Conviction for Sexual Abuse of Child Sufficient Basis for Termination of Parental Rights: The state petitioned to terminate C.T.'s parental rights on grounds that his child S.T. and the child's mother had lived with C.T. for 2 years, that C.T. was a convicted sex offender, and that both mother and child had been exposed to domestic violence. Without objection, the District Court took judicial notice of C.T.'s conviction for sexual intercourse with a minor and granted the state's petition. C.T. appealed on grounds that the court abused its discretion by terminating his parental rights on the basis of facts not alleged in the petition or supported by the evidence, asserting that even though the court took judicial notice of the conviction, that court never received the documents into evidence and therefore erred by relying on that evidence in entering its findings of fact. The Supreme Court declined to recognize a distinction between taking judicial notice and entering the noticed facts into evidence. In a civil proceeding, judicially noticed facts are accepted as conclusive, and once a fact is judicially noticed, the party offering the evidence is relieved of the duty to also move for its admission. Thus, C.T.'s conviction was not subject to reasonable dispute, and the District Court was entitled to rely on the conviction as clear and convincing evidence that C.T. had sexually abused a child and to rely on 41-3-423(2)(a) as a statutory basis for terminating C.T.'s parental rights. The District Court was affirmed. In re S.T., 2008 MT 19, 341 M 176, 176 P3d 1054 (2008).

Constitutionality of Procedures Allowing Consideration of Prior Termination of Parental Rights to Sibling: A mother asserted that procedures for terminating her parental rights violated due process, particularly when the District Court considered the prior involuntary termination of the mother's rights to A.P.'s sibling when it terminated her rights to A.P. The Supreme Court noted that because it is a fundamental liberty interest, a parent's right to the care and custody of a child must be protected by fundamentally fair procedures that ensure that the parent is not placed at an unfair disadvantage during termination proceedings. In this case, consideration of the prior termination of the mother's rights to a sibling did not violate due process. The District Court is not required to terminate, but rather the court has discretion to grant or deny the state's termination petition if the state proves the statutory elements, nor is the decision limited to the facts of the prior termination because the court also considers any available evidence relating to present family circumstances and the specific child at issue. The parent is also provided an opportunity to challenge the termination petition, and the burden of proof is on the state without placing the parent at an unfair disadvantage. The Supreme Court determined that the procedure allowing consideration of a prior termination does not violate a parent's due process rights. In re Custody & Parental Rights of A.P., 2007 MT 297, 340 M 39, 172 P3d 105 (2007).

Prior Involuntary Termination of Parental Rights to Sibling as Circumstance for Termination of Parental Rights: The involuntary termination of parental rights to a child's sibling constitutes one circumstance that a District Court may consider in terminating parental rights, as long as the circumstances related to the termination are relevant to the parent's ability to adequately care for the child at issue. The circumstances of a prior termination continue to be relevant in a later termination of a sibling unless the circumstances have changed. In this case, the District Court afforded a mother an opportunity to demonstrate that her circumstances had changed since her rights to her child's sibling were previously terminated, but the mother offered no evidence of changed circumstances, so the District Court did not err in terminating the mother's parental rights to the second child. In re Custody & Parental Rights of A.P., 2007 MT 297, 340 M 39, 172 P3d 105 (2007).

Failure to Develop Parenting Skills for Four Earlier Children — Termination of Parental Rights to Fifth Child Warranted Absent Improvement in Parenting Abilities: A mother suffered from a chromosomal abnormality known as velocardiofacial syndrome (VCFS) that caused numerous physical and cognitive difficulties and developmental delays, resulting in mental impairment and limited intellectual capacity. The father suffered severe intellectual and personality handicaps that were diagnosed as developmental and irreversible. All of the couple's children were afflicted with VCFS. Despite the efforts of the state to assist the parents in developing parenting skills over a period of several years, the parents proved unable to care for their special needs children, resulting in the termination of parental rights to the couple's first four children. The state attempted to help the parents with their fifth child, who was the subject of this case, but again the parents were unable to properly care for the child, and the state ultimately sought to terminate parental rights in order to place the child with a family that was able to provide the specialized intensive care necessary for the child's development and well-being. The District Court held that the child was a youth in need of care, and based in part on unchanged circumstances from the four previous adjudications regarding the child's siblings, the court terminated the parents' rights. The parents appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. The District Court heard extensive testimony from numerous professionals who worked with the family and opined that because the parents' conditions were permanent, chronic, and irreversible, their inability to care for the child had not changed and would not change in the future. Thus, the court properly concluded that the child was at substantial risk of ongoing or continuing physical or psychological harm by acts or omissions of the parents that were unchanged from their previous parental terminations and that termination in this case was also warranted. In re K.J.B., 2007 MT 216, 339 M 28, 168 P3d 629 (2007), followed in In re T.S.B., 2008 MT 23, 341 M 204, 177 P3d 429 (2008).

Admissibility of Evidence of Prior Conviction Based on Certified Copy of Judgment: When determining whether an aggravating circumstance existed in deciding whether to terminate a father's parental rights, the District Court admitted a certified copy of a judgment from a Texas court showing that the father pleaded guilty to and was convicted of a sexual offense. The father asserted that the evidence should not have been admitted because it could not be determined from the document whether a nolo contendere plea was accepted, which would have disallowed the evidence under Rule 803(22), M.R.Ev. (Title 26, ch. 10), and because the judgment or other evidence did not show the essential facts necessary to sustain the judgment. The state argued that the hearsay exception did apply because the father clearly entered a guilty plea and because no proof of the underlying facts was required. The Supreme Court agreed with the state. There was no evidence that the father entered a nolo contendere plea, and the Texas conviction was presumed valid absent direct evidence presented by the father that the conviction was invalid. Additionally, In re L.M.A.T. & B.L.F.T., 2002 MT 163, 310 M 422, 51 P3d 504 (2002), provided that when the state relies on a prior conviction to establish an aggravating circumstance, the state is not required to present evidence of the circumstances of the conviction. Thus, the certified copy of the judgment adjudicating guilt was adequate evidence of the conviction and was properly admitted. The state met its burden of proving that an aggravating circumstance existed, and the District Court's findings of fact were supported by substantial credible evidence supporting the conclusion that the father's prior conviction constituted an aggravating circumstance. In re. M.A.L., D.L., & T.L., 2006 MT 299, 334 M 436, 148 P3d 606 (2006).

Findings Based on More Than Prior Conviction for Crime Against Child — Sufficient Findings to Substantiate Termination of Parental Rights: A father asserted that the District Court lacked sufficient evidence to terminate his parental rights because the court relied on a prior crime committed in Texas that, if committed in Montana, would have been only a misdemeanor. The Supreme Court found that substantial evidence existed to support termination. In addition to the prior sexual crime against a child that was an aggravating circumstance under Montana law, the District Court also found that the father had no significant contact with his children for more than 3 years and failed to complete a treatment plan, that the children had been in foster care for 28 months prior to the termination hearing, and that there was evidence that one of the children claimed that the father sexually abused her. Termination of parental rights was affirmed. In re. M.A.L., D.L., & T.L., 2006 MT 299, 334 M 436, 148 P3d 606 (2006).

Out-of-State Conviction of Indecency With Child Considered Aggravating Circumstance for Purposes of Terminating Parental Rights: A father was convicted in Texas of indecency with a child. A Montana District Court considered the Texas conviction as an aggravating circumstance in terminating the father's parental rights. On appeal, the father contended that in Texas, the crime of indecency with a child was analogous to indecent exposure and asserted that the state did not introduce clear and convincing evidence that the Texas crime would constitute sexual abuse under Montana law to qualify as an aggravating circumstance. The Supreme Court disagreed. In Montana, the definition of child abuse includes indecent exposure, and the District Court properly concluded that the Texas conviction constituted an aggravating circumstance under Montana law. In re. M.A.L., D.L., & T.L., 2006 MT 299, 334 M 436, 148 P3d 606 (2006). See also In re L.M.A.T. & B.L.F.T., 2002 MT 163, 310 M 422, 51 P3d 504 (2002).

Parent's Prior Conviction of Sexual Offense Properly Applied in Parental Rights Termination Proceeding — No Retroactive Statutory Application: During proceedings to terminate a father's parental rights, the state became aware of the father's prior 1985 conviction in Texas of a sexual offense involving a minor. The District Court held that the prior conviction was an aggravating circumstance under this section for purposes of terminating the father's parental rights pursuant to 41-3-609. On appeal, the father argued that the court improperly applied the 1999 amendments to 41-3-609 and this section retroactively to a criminal act that occurred at least 13 years prior to enactment of the amendments, in violation of the father's vested constitutional parental rights. Setting out the conditions of retroactivity, the Supreme Court noted that a statute does not operate retroactively merely because it is applied to conduct that occurs prior to the statute's enactment and that an amended statute that is applied to a factual situation that occurred prior to amendment is not viewed as retroactive in application. In this case, no additional sanction was imposed on the prior conviction by enactment of the new statutory provisions, but the prior conviction was made a condition for the termination of parental rights in the event that the children were subsequently neglected or abused. Moreover, the prior conviction did not require or inevitably lead to the children being abused or neglected, necessitating the filing of an abuse and neglect petition. Rather, the prior conviction became relevant as an independent ground for the state to petition for termination of parental rights only after the children were abused and neglected. Additionally, the statutes went into effect in 1999, and the termination proceeding was initiated in 2003, so the father was on notice that the prior conviction could be used as an aggravating circumstance to justify termination if the father allowed the children to be abused and neglected. Therefore, applying the 1999 versions of 41-3-609 and this section to a conviction that occurred prior to 1999 did not constitute an unlawful retroactive application of the statutes. In re. M.A.L., D.L., & T.L., 2006 MT 299, 334 M 436, 148 P3d 606 (2006).

Preservation or Reunification Services Not Required When Child Subjected to Aggravating Circumstances: The state does not need to make reasonable efforts to provide family preservation or reunification services if a court finds that a parent has subjected a child to any of the aggravating circumstances listed in subsection (2)(a) of this section. In re M.A.L., D.L., & T.L., 2006 MT 299, 334 M 436, 148 P3d 606 (2006).

No Due Process Violations in Parental Rights Termination Proceeding — Statutory Mandates Addressed: A mother asserted that her due process rights were violated in a parental rights termination proceeding because: (1) the state failed to make reasonable efforts to reunify mother and child as required in this section; (2) the District Court, in effect, terminated her right while purporting only to grant a planned permanent living arrangement and permanent care and control of the child to the state in violation of 41-3-609; (3) the state failed to petition the District Court for termination in a timely fashion in violation of 41-3-604; and (4) the District Court failed to hold a permanency plan hearing in a timely manner in violation of 41-3-445. The Supreme Court considered each claim and affirmed. Although reunification efforts failed, the state's efforts were reasonable and in compliance with the governing statutes. The mother's parental rights were severely limited, but not actually terminated, so her argument regarding improper termination procedures failed. The state does not have to petition to terminate parental rights if a compelling reason has been documented for determining that filing a petition would not be in the child's best interests. In this case, there was such a compelling reason—namely, that the state had tried to reunify mother and child for years and did not seek termination casually. The tardy permanency hearing argument also failed in light of the state's diligent, although unsuccessful, efforts to create a permanent and stable environment for the child in an effort to ensure that the child did not languish in foster care. In re B.N.Y., 2006 MT 34, 331 M 145, 130 P3d 594 (2006). See also In re R.T.L.P., 238 M 384, 777 P2d 892 (1989), and In re A.R., 2004 MT 22, 319 M 340, 83 P3d 1287 (2004).

Preservation and Reunification Efforts Not Required in Involuntary Termination of Parental Rights: If a court involuntarily terminates a parent's rights under 41-3-609, the state may forego reasonable efforts to provide preservation or reunification services to that parent with regard to any future children placed with the state, pursuant to this section. Voluntary relinquishment is only one of several criteria that a court may consider when ordering termination of parental rights. In this case, the District Court properly terminated a mother's parental rights based in part on adjudication of the child as a youth in need of care. With the exception of minor immaterial misstatements, the court's decision was based on facts supported by substantial testimonial evidence from professionals, so termination of parental rights was not an abuse of discretion, and the decision was affirmed. In re P.S., 2006 MT 4, 330 M 239, 127 P3d 451 (2006).

Chronic and Severe Neglect Inclusive of Emotional Neglect: In terminating parental rights without reunification services, the state relied on 41-3-609 and this section in a case of chronic, severe neglect of a child. A parent asserted that parental rights may not be terminated based on a finding of severe emotional neglect, but the Supreme Court held that by definition, neglect includes psychological harm to a child. Here, the parent's ongoing drug use and repeated incarceration resulted in the parent's unavailability to the child and inconsistent caregiving, and this neglect in turn produced high anxiety and emotional disturbance in the child. Parental rights were thus properly terminated based on chronic, severe emotional neglect. In re Custody & Parental Rights of D.S., 2005 MT 275, 329 M 180, 122 P3d 1239 (2005).

Statute Not Unconstitutionally Vague for Failure to Give Notice of Conduct Considered Aggravated Circumstance: A mother's parental rights were terminated without reunification services being offered pursuant to this section after the state contended that the mother subjected her child to an aggravated circumstance, namely abuse and neglect. On appeal, the mother contended that subsection (2)(a) of this section was vague and void on its face because the term "including but not limited to" failed to clearly define the standard that would warrant either termination of parental rights or withholding of reunification services, in violation of due process. The mother also asserted that by failing to provide direction to courts in determining what an aggravated circumstance is, basic policy matters were impermissibly delegated to judges for resolution on an ad hoc basis. The Supreme Court noted that a statute is vague on its face when it fails to give a person of ordinary intelligence fair notice that contemplated conduct is forbidden and that an appellant faces a high burden of proof of showing that no standard of conduct is specified at all. The court cited Ward v. Rock Against Racism, 491 US 781 (1989), for the holding that even when statutory standards are flexible and officials implementing them will exercise considerable discretion, perfect clarity and precise guidance are not required. Here, the statute listed several examples of conduct that constituted an aggravated circumstance, including conduct that the mother exposed her child to. Because the mother failed to prove that subsection (2)(a) of this section did not give fair notice of any standard of conduct at all, the statute was not void for vagueness. In re Custody & Parental Rights of D.S., 2005 MT 275, 329 M 180, 122 P3d 1239 (2005).

Attempted Rape of Child Considered Aggravated Circumstance — Determination That Preservation or Reunification Services for Incarcerated Parent Unnecessary Not Erroneous: Generally, the state must make reasonable efforts to reunite a family after children have been removed from the home. However, a District Court may determine that preservation or reunification services are not necessary if a parent has subjected a child to aggravated circumstances. Here, the District Court determined that the services were not necessary for a parent who was incarcerated for attempted rape of a child, and the Supreme Court affirmed. The parent's sexual abuse conviction met the definition of aggravated circumstances, and the determination that preservation or reunification services were unnecessary was not erroneous. In re L.M.A.T. & B.L.F.T., 2002 MT 163, 310 M 422, 51 P3d 504 (2002).

Circumstances Related to Termination of Parental Rights to First Child Relevant to Ability to Care for Second Child: The District Court noted that a mother's parental rights to her first child, S.P., had been terminated and concluded that, because the circumstances related to the termination in S.P.'s case were still present and relevant to the mother's ability to care for her second child, C.P., the mother's parental rights to C.P. should be terminated as well. The mother appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Pursuant to 41-3-609(1)(d), the parent-child relationship may be terminated if the parent has subjected the child to any of the circumstances listed in subsection (2) of this section, including when a parent has had parental rights to the child's sibling or other child of the parent involuntarily terminated and the circumstances related to the termination of parental rights are relevant to the parent's ability to adequately care for the child at issue. The District Court did not abuse its discretion in holding that the circumstances related to the termination in S.P.'s case were still present and relevant to the mother's ability to care for C.P., that continuation of the parent-child relationship would likely result in substantial risk of harm to C.P., and that it was in C.P.'s best interests that parental rights be terminated. Parent Not Represented by Counsel During Show Cause Hearing Regarding Whether Child a Youth in Need of Care — Due Process Rights Not Violated: At the time of a show cause hearing on whether her child was a youth in need of care, the mother was an indigent mental patient civilly committed to the state hospital. She appeared at the hearing without representation of counsel. The mother contended that the District Court violated her due process rights by making that critical determination regarding the child when she was unrepresented. Although in In re A.S.A., J.L.A., G.A., & A.J.A., 258 M 194, 852 P2d 127 (1993), the Supreme Court held that the constitutional right to due process guarantees an indigent parent the right to court-appointed counsel in parental rights termination proceedings, the court has not extended the right to counsel to a pretermination proceeding in which the focal issue is whether a child is a youth in need of care. Rather, appointment of counsel at any time prior to the initiation of termination proceedings is within the discretion of the District Court. In this case, the initial determination that the child was a youth in need of care was made by order pursuant to a finding of probable cause even before the mother's first appearance in any proceedings when the District Court relied on a report submitted by a social worker showing that the child was abused or neglected or in danger of abuse or neglect and that removal from the home was necessary to protect the child's welfare. Subsequent to the initial determination, the District Court reached the same conclusion on at least three separate occasions when the mother was represented by counsel, including one hearing when the social worker was subjected to cross-examination by the mother's counsel. The Supreme Court applied In re M.F., 201 M 277, 653 P2d 1205 (1982), and in re D.S., H.S., R.S., R.S., J.S., R.S., & K.S., 253 M 484, 833 P2d 1090 (1992), and in holding that the state is not required to provide counsel at proceedings concerning temporary investigative authority (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427) or temporary custody. Thus, the mother's due process rights were not violated when the District Court made the determination that the child was a youth in need of care at a time when the mother was not represented by counsel. (See 2005 amendment.) In re A.M., 2001 MT 60, 304 M 379, 22 P3d 185 (2001).

Source of Children's PTSD Not Traceable to Father — No Abuse of Discretion by Court That Held Children Not Suffering From Abuse and Neglect Caused by Father — Temporary Investigative Authority (See 2001 Amendment to 41-3-427) and Temporary Legal Custody Properly Terminated: John, who pleaded guilty to negligent homicide in the death of his psychotic wife, Nancy, petitioned the District Court for the termination of temporary investigative authority (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427) and temporary legal custody of the Department of Public Health and Human Services, and the petition was granted. The Supreme Court held that the Department's authority was properly terminated because the District Court could not and did not find that the posttraumatic stress disorder (PTSD) suffered by John's children was caused by their father's behavior. The expert testimony given at trial showed that the children's PTSD could have been caused by living with their psychotic mother and not by their father's killing of their mother and his subsequent attempt to cover up the murder. The Supreme Court held that the District Court properly found that the children were not abused or neglected by their father and that the District Court therefore did not abuse its discretion when it granted John's petition and terminated the Department's authority. In re Inquiry Into J.L. & D.L., 2000 MT 289, 302 M 254, 14 P3d 473, 57 St. Rep. 1219 (2000).

Limited Emancipation Decisions Not Subject to Appellate Mediation Requirements: Former Rule 54, M.R.App.P. (now superseded), provided that certain domestic relations cases are subject to appellate mediation, but those cases do not include limited emancipation decisions, which are more akin to severing parental rights than to delineating how, when, and under what circumstances parental rights may be exercised. Thus, limited emancipation actions are not subject to appellate mediation requirements. In re Emancipation of Dammarell, 2000 MT 46, 298 M 391, 3 P3d 597, 57 St. Rep. 230 (2000).

Denial of Request to Remove Guardian Ad Litem Not Error: At the hearing on the petition for TIA and protective services (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427), the mother requested removal of the guardian ad litem who had worked with the family for 2 years. The District Court declined, which was not error in light of the lack of evidence that the guardian had not performed the required statutory duties. In re B.P. & A.P., 2000 MT 39, 298 M 287, 995 P2d 982, 57 St. Rep. 179 (2000), affirmed in In re B.P. & A.P., 2001 MT 219, 306 M 430, 35 P3d 291 (2001).

Interlocutory Order Granting Temporary Investigative Authority and Protective Services Not Appealable: An order for temporary investigative authority and protective services (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427) issued under 41-3-403 (renumbered 41-3-423) is not a "final judgement", a specified interlocutory order, or "an allowance for a widow or a child" and is not appealable under former Rule 1, M.R.App.P. (now superseded). In re B.P. & A.P., 2000 MT 39, 298 M 287, 995 P2d 982, 57 St. Rep. 179 (2000).

Order for Psychiatric Evaluation in Child Abuse Case Not Violative of Privilege Against Self-Incrimination: The District Court hearing a child abuse and neglect case ordered the mother to submit to a psychiatric evaluation, participate in counseling, and follow through with the therapist's recommendations. The mother claimed that the order violated her privilege against self-incrimination under the fifth amendment to the U.S. Constitution. The Supreme Court found no suggestion of criminal liability attending the mother's participation in counseling and noted that a child abuse and neglect proceeding is not a criminal case. Further, 41-3-403 (renumbered 41-3-423) specifically authorizes medical and psychological evaluations of and counseling services for the parents in such cases. Thus, a constitutional violation was not established. In re B.P. & A.P., 2000 MT 39, 298 M 287, 995 P2d 982, 57 St. Rep. 179 (2000).

Petition Need Not Allege Abuse or Neglect — Facts Establishing Probable Cause Sufficient to Issue Order for Protective Services: A petition for temporary investigative authority (TIA) and protective services (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427) must state the authority requested and facts establishing probable cause that the youth is abused or neglected or in danger of being so and must be accompanied by an affidavit or Department report stating in detail the facts on which the request is based. There is no statutory requirement that the petition contain an allegation of abuse or neglect or the evidence that the Department would present in support of its petition. The fact that the mother stipulated to a 90-day TIA, but not to protective services or the removal of the children from the home, believing that she would retain custody of the children during the 90-day period, did not preclude the District Court from ordering removal of the children from the home. The best interests of the child is paramount and takes precedence over parental rights in abuse and neglect proceedings. In re B.P. & A.P., 2000 MT 39, 298 M 287, 995 P2d 982, 57 St. Rep. 179 (2000).

Protective Removal of Children From Home Not Violative of Parent's Right of Religious Freedom — Best Interests of Children Prevail: The District Court hearing a child abuse and neglect case ordered the children removed from the home in their best interests. The mother contended that the order violated her constitutional right to religious freedom by removing her ability to participate in and control the children's religious upbringing because she couldn't see them pending her psychiatric evaluation. The Supreme Court found nothing in the record suggesting that the District Court was hostile to the mother's religious views or had based its order on those views. Rather, the order was based on evidence that the children were emotionally disturbed and threatened with harm, and the temporary restriction on the mother's access to the children was warranted. The mother remained free to pursue her religious beliefs, and the order did not infringe on that freedom. In re B.P. & A.P., 2000 MT 39, 298 M 287, 995 P2d 982, 57 St. Rep. 179 (2000), affirmed in In re B.P. & A.P., 2001 MT 219, 306 M 430, 35 P3d 291 (2001).

Dismissal of Petition for Temporary Investigative Authority (See 2001 Amendment to 41-3-427) Without Review of Guardianship Action — Harmless Error in Light of Requirements of Indian Child Welfare Act: In compliance with 41-3-403 (renumbered 41-3-423), the District Court ordered a show cause hearing at which to consider a petition for temporary investigative authority (TIA) (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427) regarding two Indian children. At the hearing, the Deputy County Attorney offered an order and memorandum from a previously dismissed guardianship proceeding as evidence. The court did not admit the documentation as evidence, but took judicial notice of it. However, at the end of the hearing, the court dismissed the petition for TIA (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427) without reviewing any records from the guardianship proceeding and ordered the Department of Public Health and Human Services to immediately place the children with their father. The mother contended that it was error to dismiss the petition without reviewing the guardianship file. In order for courts to grant TIA (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427) petitions when Indian children are involved, the requirements of the Indian Child Welfare Act must be met. Under 25 U.S.C. 1912, active efforts must be made to provide remedial services and rehabilitation programs to prevent the breakup of the Indian family. In addition, any finding that continued custody of the child by the parent or Indian custodian is likely to result in serious emotional or physical damage to the child must be based on the testimony of qualified expert witnesses. Because these requirements were not met, the court could not have granted TIA (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427) even if it had reviewed the guardianship file, so its failure to do so, if erroneous, was harmless. In re M.P.M. & A.R.M., 1999 MT 78, 294 M 87, 976 P2d 988, 56 St. Rep. 327 (1999).

Error in Placing Custody With One Parent Following Dismissal of Petition for Temporary Investigative Authority (See 2001 Amendment to 41-3-427): In compliance with 41-3-403 (renumbered 41-3-423), the District Court ordered a show cause hearing at which to consider a petition for temporary investigative authority (TIA) (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427) regarding two Indian children. At the end of the hearing, the court dismissed the petition for TIA

(see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427) and ordered the Department of Public Health and Human Services to immediately place the children with their father. The Department argued on appeal that the court exceeded its authority in ordering transfer of custody to the father after the petition for TIA (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427) was dismissed. The Supreme Court held that when the District Court vacated the orders issued following filing of the petition for TIA (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427), it did not have authority to place custody with the father because nothing in the statutory framework or legislative intent authorizes the placement of a child with one parent, as opposed to the other, following dismissal of a petition for TIA (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427). The order transferring custody to the father was reversed. In re M.P.M. & A.R.M., 1999 MT 78, 294 M 87, 976 P2d 988, 56 St. Rep. 327 (1999).

Expiration of Temporary Custody Order — No Effect on Jurisdiction: At the time that the Department of Family Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) filed a petition for temporary investigative authority (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427), the mother and her children were not living on the reservation. Subsequently, the mother moved back to the reservation and sought to have the action transferred to the tribal court. The mother argued that the District Court had lost jurisdiction over the matter when its order of temporary custody expired. The Supreme Court ruled that the child abuse and neglect statutes do not make provisions for the expiration of custody in the state or for the loss of jurisdiction by the court, other than by a finding by the court that the children are not in danger of being abused or neglected and by vacating any order made pursuant to 41-3-403 (renumbered 41-3-423). In re W.L., C.L., & B.L., 260 M 325, 859 P2d 1019, 50 St. Rep. 1081 (1993).

Continuing Court Jurisdiction Throughout Custody Hearings Proper: Father contended that, once granted, investigative authority and protective services granted to the Department of Family Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) cannot be continued by further order of the District Court. However, 41-3-403 (renumbered 41-3-423) permits the court to grant relief as may be required in the best interest of the youth, including the power to make continuing arrangements for the youth's protection. In re H.D., 256 M 70, 844 P2d 114, 49 St. Rep. 1141 (1992).

Mother's Complicity in Murder of Father as Emotional Deprivation of Children: The mother argued that the lower court had improperly granted the state temporary investigative authority (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427). The Supreme Court ruled that the lower court had not abused its authority because the mother's role in the murder of the children's father could prompt a condition of emotional deprivation in the children. In re B.H.M., C.M.M., & J.T.H., 245 M 179, 799 P2d 1090, 47 St. Rep. 1967 (1990).

Show Cause Hearing Not Required: There is no requirement that a show cause hearing be held prior to removal of youths pursuant to 41-3-403 (renumbered 41-3-423). In re J.W. & J.C., 226 M 491, 736 P2d 960, 44 St. Rep. 843 (1987).

Mere Presence of Hearsay Evidence in Court File Not Reversible Error: The presence in the court file of statements not supported by testimony is not a violation of due process or error when: (1) the authors of the reports did testify and were subject to cross-examination; (2) no evidence was presented to rebut the presumption that any hearsay within the reports themselves was disregarded by the District Court; and (3) the court explicitly based its findings upon the testimony of the witnesses and upon the reports of only those who testified. (See 1993 amendment.) In re M.L.H., H.M.H., & R.H., 220 M 288, 715 P2d 32, 43 St. Rep. 375 (1986).

Order for Protection of Youth — Rules Suspended — Procedure on Appeal: A petition for temporary investigative authority and protective services (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427) was filed by the prosecutor under 41-3-402 (renumbered 41-3-427). Temporary custody of K.H. was later awarded to county welfare department under 41-3-403 (renumbered 41-3-423). The District Court found probable cause for state intervention and ordered temporary investigative authority (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427), custody in the mother, and restrictions on the father's visitation. The parents appealed the order, an appealable order within Rule former 1, M.R.App.Civ.P. (now M.R.App.P., now superseded), but not an adequate remedy because of the time involved. Relief should properly be pursued through a Writ of Certiorari, Habeas Corpus, or Supervisory Control. The Supreme Court treated the matter as a Writ of Certiorari and denied it on the grounds that the District Court proceedings were in substantial compliance with law and that the petitioners were not prejudiced thereby. In re K.H., 216 M 267, 701 P2d 720, 42 St. Rep. 796 (1985). However, see In re B.P. & A.P., 2000 MT 39, 298 M 287, 995 P2d 982, 57 St. Rep. 179 (2000), in which it was held that because an interlocutory order granting temporary investigative authority and protective services is not appealable under former Rule 1, M.R.App.P. (now superseded).

Evidence of Sexual Abuse — Treatment Plan Ordered: Acting on evidence of sexual abuse and other problems within the family, the trial court properly found S.L.T. to be an abused and neglected child. The court granted temporary custody to the county welfare department and required that the child and her parents follow a treatment plan submitted by the welfare department. Section 41-3-404 (renumbered 41-3-437) gives the trial court authority to order any of the forms of relief listed in 41-3-403 (renumbered 41-3-423) once the court determines a child is abused or neglected. This includes the relief ordered in this case. In re S.L.T., 215 M 289, 697 P2d 472, 42 St. Rep. 366 (1985).

Dismissal Motion Properly Denied When Statutory Criteria Not Met: Based on the Supreme Court's prior holding in In re D.B. & D.B., 2007 MT 246, 339 M 240, 168 P3d 691 (2007) (In re D.B. I), the mother moved to dismiss a parental rights termination case on grounds that the District Court proceedings did not contain sufficient evidence to apply the proper statutory criteria required by In re D.B. I. The court denied the dismissal motion and the mother appealed. The Supreme Court affirmed. Only when the criteria of 41-3-424 are met may a petition be properly dismissed, and the mother failed to satisfy those criteria. The children remained youths in need of care and the District Court was required to provide some form of relief as established in 41-3-422, so dismissal was inappropriate and unavailable to the mother. In re D.B. & D.B., 2008 MT 272, 345 M 225, 190 P3d 1072 (2008).

Dismissal of Parenting Action Following Placement of Children Under Permanency Plan — Appeal Moot: While a parenting action was pending in Flathead County, a District Court in Missoula County approved a permanency plan that placed the children in California with the mother. The father did not appeal the placement order. The Flathead County action was subsequently dismissed, and the father appealed. The Supreme Court held that the Flathead County order was moot because the state no longer possessed authority over the custody and placement of the children, and in the absence of an ongoing, concrete controversy, effective relief could not be granted. The appeal was dismissed. In re J.A.S. & E.R.S., 2008 MT 269, 345 M 189, 190 P3d 299 (2008).

2001 Amendments — Composite Section: Chapter 281 throughout section after "petition for" substituted "immediate protection and emergency protective services" for "temporary investigative authority and protective services"; in (1)(a) inserted second sentence requiring that the child's health and safety be of paramount concern; in (1)(c) at beginning of third sentence substituted "The parents, if available in person or by electronic means" for "Except as provided in 41-3-403, the parents" and after "opportunity to" substituted "present evidence to the court" for "address the court"; inserted (2) regarding burden of establishing probable cause and forms of relief to be stated in the order; inserted (3) requiring a finding that continued residence of the child with the parent is contrary to the welfare of the child or that an out-of-home placement is in the best interests of the child; inserted (4) providing that the order for immediate protection of the child must require the person served to comply immediately with the terms of the order and to appear before the court for a show cause hearing and allowing the court to hold the person in contempt or place temporary physical custody of the child with the department upon failure to comply or show cause; inserted (5) regarding service of the petition; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2001.

Chapter 311 in (1)(c) in first sentence substituted "signed by a representative of the department stating in detail" for "signed by the county attorney, the attorney general, or an attorney hired by the county or must be supported by a department report stating in detail" and near beginning of second sentence after "affidavit" deleted reference to a report; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2001.

Saving Clause: Section 19, Ch. 281, L. 2001, was a saving clause.

1997 Amendment: Chapter 501 in (3) inserted second and third sentences concerning content of petition, affidavit, or report and opportunity for parents to address court; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective May 2, 1997.

1995 Amendments: Chapter 458 in (1) and (3), after "by the county", deleted "welfare department or office of human services"; in (3) inserted "must be supported by" and after "department" deleted "of family services"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 14, 1995.

Chapter 546 in (3) substituted "department of public health and human services" for "department of family services"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1995.

Saving Clause: Section 571, Ch. 546, L. 1995, was a saving clause.

1987 Amendment: In middle of (3) changed provision that affidavit be signed by a county welfare department attorney or office of human services attorney to allow signing by an attorney hired by the county welfare department or office of human services and near end substituted "department of family services" for "department of social and rehabilitation services".

1985 Amendment: In (1) near middle after "county attorney" inserted "or an attorney hired by the county welfare department or office of human services"; and in (3) near middle after "county attorney", inserted "attorney general, county welfare department attorney, or office of human services attorney".

Case Notes

Improper Reliance on Parenting Plan Statutes in Granting Temporary Guardianship — Reversal Required: Pursuant to a stipulated parenting plan, the father was designated primary custodian of the couple's son and the mother was awarded visitation every other weekend. When the father received orders to report for active military duty, he moved to have the couple that he and the son lived with and the mother's sister appointed as temporary guardians. The mother moved to dismiss, but the District Court granted the father's motion, and the mother appealed. Reviewing the appealable order granting temporary guardianship, the Supreme Court reversed. The District Court's reliance on 40-4-219 for granting the guardianship was misplaced because that section applies only to modification of a parenting plan with respect to the parents and does not provide authority to decide custody matters between a parent and a third party, including appointment of a third party as a guardian. The District Court's reliance on 40-4-228 for granting the guardianship was also misplaced because that section provides standards by which a court may award a parental interest to a nonparent who has brought a parenting plan proceeding pursuant to 40-4-211, but no such proceeding was brought in this case. The District Court also mistakenly relied on this section in granting the guardianship because this section deals with child abuse and neglect, but does not provide independent authority for appointment of a guardian in disregard of the guardianship statutes. Rather, the father's request was governed by the guardianship statutes in Title 72, ch. 5, which the District Court did not address. The Supreme Court noted that the guardianship provisions in 72-5-222 apply only when a court order has addressed a party's right to parent, as opposed to arrangements defining a parent's custody and visitation under a parenting plan. The mother's right to parent was never previously limited by court order, so the District Court lacked jurisdiction to appoint a guardian for the child pursuant to 72-5-222, and granting the father's petition for temporary guardianship was reversible error. The Supreme Court remanded for the entry of an order vacating the guardianship. Fischer v. Fischer, 2007 MT 101, 337 M 122, 157 P3d 682 (2007).

Action of Recused Judge in Temporary Child Custody Proceedings Affirmed: A District Court Judge signed an order recusing himself from parental rights termination proceedings, but subsequently presided over an emergency temporary custody and protective services proceeding before the recusal order was filed. The parties questioned when the recusal was effective and whether it affected the validity of the emergency proceeding. The Supreme Court concluded that the recusal question did not affect the disposition of the case because, regardless of when the order became effective, the emergency hearing did not affect the child's permanent legal custody or the parent's rights. Thus, the judge's action in conducting the hearing after recusing himself did not warrant reversal in light of the fundamentally fair procedures afforded in the subsequent youth adjudication and parental rights termination proceedings. In re A.N.W., 2006 MT 42, 331 M 208, 130 P3d 619 (2006).

Parent Not Allowed to Examine or Present Witnesses During Child Adjudication Hearing — No Due Process Violation: A father claimed a due process violation when the District Court discontinued a hearing to determine whether his child was a youth in need of care before the father was allowed to examine a witness or to present two of his own witnesses. Fundamental fairness and due process require that a parent not be placed at an unfair disadvantage during parental rights termination proceedings; however, pretermination proceedings entitle a parent to less process than the actual termination proceedings. In this case, the father did not allege that allowing him to examine a witness or to present his own witnesses would have provided any relevant information or that failing to do so prejudiced him. The proceeding was fundamentally fair, and the District Court's decision to terminate the hearing was not reversible error. In re A.N.W., 2006 MT 42, 331 M 208, 130 P3d 619 (2006). See also In Re Custody & Parental Rights of M.W. & C.S., 2001 MT 78, 305 M 80, 23 P3d 206 (2001).

Failure to Adjudicate Child as Youth in Need of Care — Termination of Parental Rights Improper: A mother was arrested for a parole violation, and the state filed a petition to investigate whether her children were abused or neglected. The District Court granted the petition on a preliminary basis, and the children were placed in a foster home. The mother was released on bond but failed to appear for a show cause hearing. The state's petition was then granted, and the court found that it was in the children's best interests to be removed from the home. The mother was later arrested again, released the following day, and left for Florida, leaving the children behind. She was arrested in Florida about 3 months later, and while incarcerated there, Montana filed for approval of a treatment plan. The treatment plan was faxed to the mother, but she refused to sign it. The plan was approved without her signature. A district citizen review board then recommended that the mother's parental rights be terminated based on the mother's criminal history, the social history of the case, and the children's need for permanence. The District Court terminated the mother's parental rights for failing to comply with the treatment plan, and the mother appealed. The Supreme Court held that termination of parental rights was in error because the children had never been adjudicated as youths in need of care through an adjudicatory hearing, as required by this section. A stipulation by the mother to let the court give temporary custody of the children to the state did not constitute a stipulation or an adjudication that the children were youths in need of care. In re T.C. & W.C., 2001 MT 264, 307 M 244, 37 P3d 70 (2001).

Substantial Risk of Harm to Child — Parental Rights Terminated Despite Lack of Evidence of Abuse or Neglect: A girl was born to a mother who was later divorced and remarried. When the girl was 15, she had sexual intercourse with her stepfather and conceived a baby. The state petitioned for temporary investigative authority (TIA) and emergency protective services (see 2001 amendment—now "immediate protection and emergency protective services") over both the girl and her baby, pursuant to 41-3-402 (renumbered 41-3-427). The mother then agreed to divorce the stepfather so that he could marry the girl. The petition regarding the girl was dismissed because she was married and was no longer subject to the mother's parental control. At the show cause hearing on the petition regarding protection of the baby, a state social worker testified that, although there was no indication of actual abuse or neglect of the baby, there was concern for the baby's safety should the baby be placed in the home with the girl and stepfather. The state ultimately petitioned to terminate the girl's parental rights to the baby. The District Court determined that the baby was a youth in need of care and terminated the girl's parental rights. The girl appealed on grounds that the court's determination that the baby was a youth in need of care was erroneous, absent any evidence of abuse, neglect, or abandonment, and that the petition for TIA was insufficient on its face because it contained no allegations that the baby was abused or neglected. However, the definition of abuse or neglect in 41-3-102 includes either actual harm or the substantial risk of harm. Thus, the report required by this section need set forth in detail only facts supporting the petition's request for TIA based on the assertion that a child is abused or neglected or is in danger of being abused or neglected. The social worker's testimony was considered sufficient to support a finding that there was substantial risk of harm to the baby if returned to the girl's custody; therefore, the District Court's determination that the baby was a youth in need of care was correct. The court's finding that under the circumstances, the baby had little hope of a normal emotional, moral, and psychological development with his parents was also supported by substantial evidence and was not clearly erroneous, based on the social worker's testimony that the girl's relationship with the stepfather was unhealthy, that the family unit exhibited extremely poor boundaries, and that the girl had obvious psychological damage from being sexually abused by her father and would, without successful treatment, be unable to set appropriate boundaries for the baby or be able to understand the risk of harm that her relationship with the stepfather posed to the baby. The Supreme Court affirmed. In re D.T.H., 2001 MT 138, 305 M 502, 29 P3d 1003 (2001).

Stipulation Not Considered Sufficient Adjudication of Youth in Need of Care — Lack of Jurisdictional Prerequisite to Terminate Parental Rights: The mother entered into a stipulation with the state that her children were youths in need of care only upon several conditions: (1) her parental rights would remain intact; (2) the children would reside with their grandmother; (3) the Casey Family Program would manage the children's cases; (4) the mother would always have contact with the children even if the program was required to intervene between the mother and grandmother; and (5) at an appropriate time when the mother was ready, the program, the Department, and the mother would devise a treatment plan that would be completed by the mother in order to regain custody of the children. At a subsequent hearing, the Department proposed a permanency plan that involved removing the children from their grandmother. The mother contended that the proposal amounted to a failure to abide by the conditions of the stipulation, thereby voiding the conditional stipulation that the children were youths in need of care and precluding the District Court's authority to terminate her parental rights. The Supreme Court agreed. Although a stipulation may be an acceptable alternative to an adjudicatory hearing in many circumstances, the fundamental nature of the rights of a parent requires that the process by which a stipulation is drafted and signed needs to be closely scrutinized. In this case, the stipulation was drafted by the County Attorney and signed by the mother without the benefit of legal counsel and essentially allowed the court to determine that the youths were in need of care without a finding that they were abused or neglected and without a hearing as required by 41-3-402 (renumbered 41-3-427). The mother had conflicting feelings about the removal of the children from their grandmother's care and relied on her understanding from the stipulation that the Department would not remove the children or terminate her parental rights, so she did not complete her treatment plan. Only a few days after the initial hearing, she promptly began work toward completion of the treatment plan and had made significant progress, particularly considering the unexpected death of her mother, by the time of the next hearing. Despite the change in circumstances resulting from the death, the Department did not grant the mother any additional time to complete the treatment plan, nor did the Department offer any evidence that the mother had abused or neglected the children. Under the unique facts of this case, the Supreme Court held that the District Court incorrectly found that the stipulation sufficed as an adjudication that the children were youths in need of care. Without that adjudication, the District Court lacked the jurisdictional prerequisite to terminate the mother's parental rights, so the Supreme Court reversed. In Re Custody and Parental Rights of M.W. & C.S., 2001 MT 78, 305 M 80, 23 P3d 206 (2001).

Source of Children's PTSD Not Traceable to Father — No Abuse of Discretion by Court That Held Children Not Suffering From Abuse and Neglect Caused by Father — Temporary Investigative Authority (Now "Immediate Protection and Emergency Protective Services") and Temporary Legal Custody Properly Terminated: John, who pleaded guilty to negligent homicide in the death of his psychotic wife, Nancy, petitioned the District Court for the termination of temporary investigative authority (see 2001 amendment—now "immediate protection and emergency protective services") and temporary legal custody of the Department of Public Health and Human Services, and the petition was granted. The Supreme Court held that the Department's authority was properly terminated because the District Court could not and did not find that the posttraumatic stress disorder (PTSD) suffered by John's children was caused by their father's behavior. The expert testimony given at trial showed that the children's PTSD could have been caused by living with their psychotic mother and not by their father's killing of their mother and his subsequent attempt to cover up the murder. The Supreme Court held that the District Court properly found that the children were not abused or neglected by their father and that the District Court therefore did not abuse its discretion when it granted John's petition and terminated the Department's authority. In re Inquiry Into J.L. & D.L., 2000 MT 289, 302 M 254, 14 P3d 473, 57 St. Rep. 1219 (2000).

Petition Need Not Allege Abuse or Neglect — Facts Establishing Probable Cause Sufficient to Issue Order for Protective Services: A petition for temporary investigative authority (TIA) and protective services (see 2001 amendment—now "immediate protection and emergency protective services") must state the authority requested and facts establishing probable cause that the youth is abused or neglected or in danger of being so and must be accompanied by an affidavit or Department report stating in detail the facts on which the request is based. There is no statutory requirement that the petition contain an allegation of abuse or neglect or the evidence that the Department would present in support of its petition. The fact that the mother stipulated to a 90-day TIA, but not to protective services or the removal of the children from the home, believing that she would retain custody of the children during the 90-day period, did not preclude the District Court from ordering removal of the children from the home. The best interests of the child is paramount and takes precedence over parental rights in abuse and neglect proceedings. Appeal From Extension of Temporary Investigative Authority (Now "Immediate Protection and Emergency Protective Services") Held Moot — Permanent Custody Transferred to Father: When A.E.'s mother, Teresa, filed a pro se appeal from the District Court's extension of temporary custody and temporary investigative authority (see 2001 amendment—now "immediate protection and emergency protective services") of the Department of Public Health and Human Services (Department), Teresa's ex-husband, who was the natural father of A.E., sought and received an amendment to the previous dissolution decree by which his marriage to Teresa was dissolved. The amendment transferred permanent custody of A.E. from Teresa to A.E.'s father. Upon the transfer of custody, the Department sought and received dismissal of its petition for extension of temporary custody and to vacate the District Court's order awarding it temporary legal custody for the purposes of the investigation. On appeal of the award of the extension of temporary investigative authority (see 2001 amendment—"now immediate protection and emergency protective services"), the Supreme Court held that the appeal had been rendered moot because the Department no longer had temporary custody of A.E. and because the Department no longer possessed the authority to investigate. For this reason, the Supreme Court dismissed the appeal. In re A.E., 1998 MT 159, 289 M 340, 961 P2d 1265, 55 St. Rep. 638 (1998).

Evidence Sufficient to Warrant Grant of Temporary Investigative Authority (Now "Immediate Protection and Emergency Protective Services"): Evidence of the mother's previous history of psychiatric problems, fires in the family home, one child's extensive absences from school, and the inability of social workers to investigate these problems due to mother's noncooperation constituted sufficient facts to warrant granting of temporary investigative authority (see 2001 amendment—now "immediate protection and emergency protective services"). In re J.W. & J.C., 226 M 491, 736 P2d 960, 44 St. Rep. 843 (1987).

Only Show Cause Hearing Required Upon Filing Petition for Temporary Investigative Authority (Now "Immediate Protection and Emergency Protective Services"): A mother contended that an order granting temporary custody to the state and allowing temporary investigative authority (see 2001 amendment—now "immediate protection and emergency protective services") under 41-3-402 (renumbered 41-3-427) should be vacated for lack of an adjudicatory hearing pursuant to 41-3-404 (renumbered 41-3-437) and a dispositional hearing pursuant to 41-3-406 (renumbered 41-3-438). In denying the motion to vacate, the District Court properly held that a show cause hearing is the only hearing required when a petition for temporary investigative authority (see 2001 amendment—now "immediate protection and emergency protective services") is filed. In re J.W. & J.C., 226 M 491, 736 P2d 960, 44 St. Rep. 843 (1987).

In-Chambers Interview — Record Required: A District Court may conduct an in-chambers interview of children in an abuse, neglect, and dependency proceeding. A record must be made of any interview conducted. In re M.L.H., H.M.H., & R.H., 220 M 288, 715 P2d 32, 43 St. Rep. 375 (1986).

Exclusion of Evidence on Child Abuse Proceeding Concerning Father — Harmless Error: It was harmless error, in a child custody modification proceeding, for a District Court judge to exclude evidence that a petition for temporary investigative authority (see 2001 amendment—now "immediate protection and emergency protective services"), alleging sexual abuse by the father, had been filed under Title 41, ch. 3, and dismissed for lack of evidence after being heard by the same judge who made the custody modification determination. In re Marriage of Stout, 216 M 342, 701 P2d 729, 42 St. Rep. 856 (1985).

Order for Protection of Youth — Rules Suspended — Procedure on Appeal: A petition for temporary investigative authority and protective services (see 2001 amendment—now "immediate protection and emergency protective services") was filed by the prosecutor under 41-3-402 (renumbered 41-3-427). Temporary custody of K.H. was later awarded to county welfare department under 41-3-403 (renumbered 41-3-423). The District Court found probable cause for state intervention and ordered temporary investigative authority (see 2001 amendment—now "immediate protection and emergency protective services"), custody in the mother, and restrictions on the father's visitation. The parents appealed the order, an appealable order within Rule former 1, M.R.App.Civ.P. (now M.R.App.P., now superseded), but not an adequate remedy because of the time involved. Relief should properly be pursued through a Writ of Certiorari, Habeas Corpus, or Supervisory Control. The Supreme Court treated the matter as a Writ of Certiorari and denied it on the grounds that the District Court proceedings were in substantial compliance with law and that the petitioners were not prejudiced thereby. In re K.H., 216 M 267, 701 P2d 720, 42 St. Rep. 796 (1985). However, see In re B.P. & A.P., 2000 MT 39, 298 M 287, 995 P2d 982, 57 St. Rep. 179 (2000), in which it was held that because an interlocutory order granting temporary investigative authority and protective services (see 2001 amendment—now "immediate protection and emergency protective services") is not appealable under former Rule 1, M.R.App.P. (now superseded).

Prehearing Report — Petition for Permanent Custody: The Supreme Court avoided deciding whether or not it is proper for a County Attorney to file a prehearing report in support of a petition under 41-3-401 (renumbered 41-3-422) for permanent custody since the only report in the record was filed in support of a temporary investigative authority and protective services (see 2001 amendment—now "immediate protection and emergency protective services") petition under 41-3-402(3) (renumbered 41-3-427(3)). Case Notes

Adjudication of Youth in Need of Care Without Specific Request Affirmed: A parent asserted that the District Court lacked authority to adjudicate a child as a youth in need of care because there was no request for such adjudication contained in the initial petitions for emergency protective services and temporary investigative authority. The Supreme Court disagreed. The relief sought in a petition filed under 41-3-422 may include any relief required for the best interests of the child, and 41-3-432 allows a court to adjudicate a child as a youth in need of care at the show cause hearing for immediate protection and emergency protective services. Thus, the District Court was not foreclosed from adjudicating the child as a youth in need of care following filing of the initial petitions for emergency protective services and temporary investigative authority. In re B.S. & G.S., 2009 MT 98, 350 M 86, 206 P3d 565 (2009).

Hearsay Evidence and Parental Rights Termination — Admission of Hearsay Evidence at Show Cause, Adjudicatory, and Termination Hearings Held Proper Because Children "Unavailable" — J.C.E. Case Distinguished — No Offer of Proof Made: Hearsay evidence in the form of videotaped interviews of young children talking with investigators about sexual abuse by their parents was admitted after the District Court found that the children were "unavailable" to testify because they would be traumatized by testifying against their parents in a courtroom setting. The Supreme Court held that the videotaped testimony was properly admitted by the District Court, based upon the thorough findings by the District Court, at the show cause hearing, the adjudicatory hearing, and the parental rights termination hearing. The Supreme Court distinguished St. v. J.C.E., 235 M 264, 767 P2d 309 (1988), because that case was a criminal case in which the right of confrontation under Art. II, sec. 24, Mont. Const., applied, whereas the case now before the Supreme Court was a civil case. The Supreme Court also held that the District Court properly analyzed the mother's attempt to call the children as witnesses as one of relevance, and because no offer of proof was made under Rule 103, M.R.Ev. (Title 26, ch. 10), by the mother, the Supreme Court could not conclude that the District Court acted arbitrarily. In re O.A.W., 2007 MT 13, 335 M 304, 153 P3d 6 (2007).

Erroneous Award of Custody at Adjudicatory Hearing Cured by Immediate Scheduling of Dispositional Hearing to Address Dispositional Issue Separately: The District Court failed to structure dispositional issues apart from adjudicatory issues when it granted temporary legal custody of two children to the state during an adjudicatory hearing. However, upon discovering the error, the court immediately scheduled a dispositional hearing to address the dispositional issue separately. Although not excusing the error, the Supreme Court held that holding a second dispositional hearing made the initial order placing the children with the state during the adjudicatory hearing the functional equivalent to an order of placement pending the dispositional hearing because temporary placement outside the home is allowed at every stage of the proceeding pursuant to 41-3-301, 41-3-437, and this section. The error was harmless and nonprejudicial and did not warrant reversal. In re S.C. & L.Z., 2005 MT 241, 328 M 476, 121 P3d 552 (2005).

Petition for Permanent Custody and Termination of Parental Rights Not Considered Initial Filing — Show Cause Hearing Timely: Under the 2001 amendments to this section, a District Court is generally required to conduct a show cause hearing within 10 days of the filing of an initial child abuse and neglect petition. A petition for permanent legal custody in this case was filed on September 18, 2001, and was the first document personally served on a father incarcerated in Washington state. The father contended that the petition therefore qualified as the initial pleading, so the hearing held November 5, 2001, was well past the 10-day requirement (see 2003 amendment). The Supreme Court disagreed. The petition for permanent legal custody did not constitute an initial filing; rather, the initial filing was the state's petition for temporary investigative authority and protective services filed on November 17, 2000. The statute in effect at that time required a show cause hearing within 20 days of issuance of an order granting relief as required for the immediate protection of a child, and a show cause hearing was held December 4, 2000, well within the 20-day timeframe. The court noted that even if the father's argument that the petition that he was personally served was considered the initial filing, this section would still not apply because it was not in effect on September 18, 2001. Case Notes

Mother's Stipulation That Child Be Adjudicated Youth in Need of Care Prior to Determination of Child's Status as Indian — Parental Termination Proceedings Not Invalidated: The state petitioned for termination of a mother's parental rights based on her lack of progress with the court-ordered treatment plan. The state recognized the child's Indian status and notified the Blackfeet Tribe. The tribe's motion to intervene in order to monitor the proceedings was granted, and the mother's parental rights were terminated the following day after the mother stipulated to adjudication of the child as a youth in need of care. The mother subsequently appealed on grounds that it was error to terminate her parental rights prior to a determination that the child was subject to the Indian Child Welfare Act (ICWA). The Supreme Court disagreed and affirmed. The District Court complied with ICWA in finding by clear and convincing evidence that the child was a youth in need of care and that the child's best interests would be served by termination of the parent-child relationship. The fact that the court accepted the mother's stipulation before definitively establishing the child's Indian status did not invalidate the proceedings. The District Court was affirmed. In re J.M., 2009 MT 332, 353 M 64, 218 P3d 1213 (2009).

Parent's Acquiescence in Adjudicatory Proceedings — Finding That Child Is Youth in Need of Care Based on Parent's Admissions — Stipulation Not Required: A mother contested termination of her parental rights on grounds that her child was not properly adjudicated as a youth in need of care. The mother was incarcerated at the time of the hearing and contended that although she agreed to a treatment plan, she never admitted that the child met the definition of a youth in need of care or stipulated that the child was in need of care. The Supreme Court noted that the trial court should have specifically inquired of the mother or her counsel whether the mother stipulated that the child was a youth in need of care, but it was not error for the District Court to make that finding based on the mother's own admissions that she was addicted to methamphetamine and needed treatment and that her addiction impacted the child unfairly. The mother was not placed at an unfair disadvantage during the termination proceedings and was represented by counsel at all stages. She never questioned the regularity of the proceedings until appeal. The court held that because 35 months had passed between the adjudicatory hearing and the notice of appeal, it would not be in the child's best interests to prolong the matter, particularly when much of the delay was caused by the mother's repeated relapses and her failure to put the child's interests above her desire to indulge her addiction. The adjudication was proper and did not prejudice the mother, and the District Court was affirmed. In re A.S., 2006 MT 281, 334 M 280, 146 P3d 778 (2006).

Separate Dispositional Hearing Not Required When Parental Stipulations Made Regarding Adjudication and Placement of Children and Treatment Plans: Under 41-3-438, a separate dispositional hearing is not required if parental stipulations are entered pursuant to this section. In this case, the parents stipulated to their children being youths in need of care, to the children being placed in temporary state custody, and to signing treatment plans. Given the parents' stipulations to the pertinent dispositional issues, a separate dispositional hearing was not required. In re B.B. & J.B., 2006 MT 66, 331 M 407, 133 P3d 215 (2006).

Adjudication Properly Based on Parents' Stipulation That Children Considered Youths in Need of Care: Following termination of their parental rights, the parents contended that termination was not proper because the children were never adjudicated as youths in need of care, which is the threshold for termination proceedings. Although there was no hearing at which that determination was made based on a preponderance of the evidence, under this section, a parent may stipulate that a child is a youth in need of care, and the parents in this case twice stipulated that their children were in need of care—once when they signed a stipulation to temporary legal custody and again when they signed a stipulation to the extension of temporary legal custody. Based on these stipulations and the holding in In Re Custody & Parental Rights of M.W. & C.S., 2001 MT 78, 305 M 80 (2001), the children were properly adjudicated as youths in need of care. In re M.B., J.B., & W.B., 2004 MT 304, 323 M 468, 100 P3d 1006 (2004).

Chapter 281 inserted (1) requiring an adjudicatory hearing when an appropriate petition is filed; in (2) in first sentence after "evidence" inserted "except as provided in the federal Indian Child Welfare Act, if applicable" and inserted second and third sentences regarding applicability of rules of civil procedure and evidence to the adjudicatory hearing and clarifying scope of the hearing; in (3) near middle after "residence of the child" inserted "paternity, if in question"; in (6)(a) after "pursuant to" substituted "41-3-427 or 41-3-432" for "41-3-403"; in (6)(b) near middle of first sentence after "conducted within" substituted "20 days, as provided in 41-3-438(2)" for "30 days" and at end of third sentence substituted "41-3-427(2)" for "41-3-403(6)"; inserted (7) requiring the court to make written findings regarding certain issues prior to adjudication; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2001.

Chapter 311 in (3) inserted last sentence relating to hearsay statements made by the youth. Amendment effective October 1, 2001.

Applicability: Section 8, Ch. 194, L. 2001, provided: "[This act] applies to proceedings on petitions filed pursuant to 41-3-401 [now 41-3-422] after October 1, 2001."

Saving Clause: Section 19, Ch. 281, L. 2001, was a saving clause.

1999 Amendments — Composite Section: Chapter 481 in (3) near middle after "child" deleted "and granted in Title 26, chapter 1, part 8", after "26-1-803 and the" substituted "mediation" for "mediator", and at end substituted "26-1-813" for "26-1-811, apply"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 1999.

Chapter 566 at end of (4)(b) substituted "41-3-403(6)" for "41-3-403(3)". Amendment effective October 1, 1999.

1997 Amendment: Chapter 516 in (1), near middle after "determine", inserted "by a preponderance of the evidence"; in (3), at end after "26-1-803", inserted "and the mediator privilege granted by 26-1-811"; and in (4)(b), at beginning of first sentence after "If", substituted "the youth is adjudicated a youth in need of care" for "the court determines that the youth is an abused or neglected child" and at end substituted "41-3-403(3)" for "41-3-403(2)".

Applicability: Section 20, Ch. 516, L. 1997, provided that this section applies to proceedings commenced on or after October 1, 1997.

1995 Amendment: Chapter 458 in (3), after "neglect", deleted "or dependency"; in (4)(a) and (4)(b), after "neglected", deleted "or dependent"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 14, 1995.

1985 Amendment: In (1) near beginning, after "41-3-401", deleted "or 41-3-402"; and in (4)(b), in first sentence, after "hearing", inserted "to be conducted within 30 days", and deleted former second sentence that read: "The dispositional hearing shall be scheduled as soon as practicable."

Case Notes

Sufficient Evidence That Children in Need of Care — Parental Rights Properly Terminated: In 2004, a mother left her two children with a 16-year-old babysitter and did not return for over 24 hours. The children were placed in temporary legal custody with the state, where they remained thereafter. The state attempted to work on reunifying the family, but the mother repeatedly failed to comply with treatment plans, continued her heavy drinking, was arrested several times, and spent periods incarcerated. The children were tribal members, and the state gave proper tribal notification and had an Indian Child Welfare Act expert testify on several occasions that continued parental custody was likely to result in serious emotional or physical harm to the children and that there were no family members available to take the children. The children were adjudicated youth in need of care, and the state eventually sought to terminate the mother's parental rights in 2008. The mother appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. The children had been in foster care for over 4 years, exceeding the threshold for triggering the presumption that termination was in the children's best interests. A reasonable person could conclude, as did the District Court, that the children were in need of care and that the mother's parental rights should be terminated. Substantial evidence showed that the mother: (1) had been charged with four separate criminal offenses and was the subject of a bench warrant; (2) entered an intensive outpatient drug treatment program but stopped after five sessions, indicating a high potential for substance abuse that could only be controlled by incarceration or inpatient treatment; (3) did not complete any parts of the court-approved treatment plan; (4) missed a number of scheduled visits with the children; (5) failed to address her mental health issues; (6) failed to obtain adequate housing; (7) failed to make reunification with the children a priority; and (8) was unlikely to change her pattern of substance abuse and her unstable lifestyle. In re T.W.F & A.R.M., 2009 MT 207, 351 M 233, 210 P3d 174 (2009).

No Error in Denial of Continuance of Parental Rights Termination Proceeding to Determine Placement of Children: During his testimony at a hearing on termination of a father's parental rights, the father requested a continuance in order for a hearing to be held regarding whether placement of the children with their grandparents was in the children's best interests. The District Court denied the request, and on appeal the Supreme Court affirmed. The question of possible placement of the children had no bearing on whether the statutory criteria for terminating the father's parental rights had been established, and the District Court did not abuse its discretion in declining to delay final determination of the father's parental rights. In re B.S. & G.S., 2009 MT 98, 350 M 86, 206 P3d 565 (2009). See also In re O.A.W., 2007 MT 13, 335 M 304, 153 P3d 6 (2007).

Sufficient Evidence to Adjudicate Children as Youths in Need of Care: The District Court properly adjudicated children as youths in need of care based on evidence that: (1) there was a significant prior history of domestic violence and domestic abuse between the parents in the presence of the children; (2) one of the children exhibited various behavior and developmental problems, including running away, violent behavior, anger control problems, and poor language skills; (3) the father could not care for the children because of his long-term federal incarceration; (4) the mother, who was living at a shelter for domestic abuse victims and dealing with mental health issues, had voluntarily surrendered the children to state care because of her inability to adequately parent them; and (5) the state had made reasonable efforts to avoid placement of the children or to make it possible to safely return the children to the home, but protective placement was required. In re B.S. & G.S., 2009 MT 98, 350 M 86, 206 P3d 565 (2009).

Hearsay Evidence and Parental Rights Termination — Admission of Hearsay Evidence at Show Cause, Adjudicatory, and Termination Hearings Held Proper Because Children "Unavailable" — J.C.E. Case Distinguished — No Offer of Proof Made: Hearsay evidence in the form of videotaped interviews of young children talking with investigators about sexual abuse by their parents was admitted after the District Court found that the children were "unavailable" to testify because they would be traumatized by testifying against their parents in a courtroom setting. The Supreme Court held that the videotaped testimony was properly admitted by the District Court, based upon the thorough findings by the District Court, at the show cause hearing, the adjudicatory hearing, and the parental rights termination hearing. The Supreme Court distinguished St. v. J.C.E., 235 M 264, 767 P2d 309 (1988), because that case was a criminal case in which the right of confrontation under Art. II, sec. 24, Mont. Const., applied, whereas the case now before the Supreme Court was a civil case. The Supreme Court also held that the District Court properly analyzed the mother's attempt to call the children as witnesses as one of relevance, and because no offer of proof was made under Rule 103, M.R.Ev. (Title 26, ch. 10), by the mother, the Supreme Court could not conclude that the District Court acted arbitrarily. In re O.A.W., 2007 MT 13, 335 M 304, 153 P3d 6 (2007).

Parent's Excited Utterance Following Domestic Disturbance Not Considered Hearsay in Proceeding Adjudicating Child as Youth in Need of Care: In adjudicating a child as a youth in need of care, the District Court relied on statements made by the mother to an officer who was investigating a domestic disturbance at the family residence. Following adjudication, the court implemented a treatment plan, which the father refused to sign. The court subsequently terminated the father's parental rights for failing to comply with the treatment plan. The father contended that the District Court improperly admitted hearsay evidence from the officer that provided the evidentiary support for designating the child as a youth in need of care. The Supreme Court disagreed. The excited utterance exception to the hearsay rule under Rule 803, M.R.Ev. (Title 26, ch. 10), applied to the officer's testimony regarding the mother's statements because the statements were made immediately after the mother had been fighting with the father and while she was still visibly upset. Thus, the District Court did not abuse its discretion in allowing the officer's testimony. In re T.W. & J.M., 2006 MT 153, 332 M 454, 139 P3d 810 (2006), distinguishing In re Marriage of Bonamarte, 263 M 170, 866 P2d 1132 (1994).

Erroneous Award of Custody at Adjudicatory Hearing Cured by Immediate Scheduling of Dispositional Hearing to Address Dispositional Issue Separately: The District Court failed to structure dispositional issues apart from adjudicatory issues when it granted temporary legal custody of two children to the state during an adjudicatory hearing. However, upon discovering the error, the court immediately scheduled a dispositional hearing to address the dispositional issue separately. Although not excusing the error, the Supreme Court held that holding a second dispositional hearing made the initial order placing the children with the state during the adjudicatory hearing the functional equivalent to an order of placement pending the dispositional hearing because temporary placement outside the home is allowed at every stage of the proceeding pursuant to 41-3-301, 41-3-432, and this section. The error was harmless and nonprejudicial and did not warrant reversal. In re S.C. & L.Z., 2005 MT 241, 328 M 476, 121 P3d 552 (2005).

Proper Finding That Youths in Need of Care — Expert Testimony Based in Part on Hearsay — Adequate Exercise of Independent Factfinding Judgment: The District Court found that two youths were in need of care. The mother appealed on grounds of insufficient evidence and contended that the District Court erroneously adopted the state's findings of fact and conclusions of law without substantial change, but the Supreme Court affirmed. The record contained sufficient credible evidence to support the findings that the children were abused and neglected by the mother's actions that injured the children's capacity to function emotionally or psychologically and thus were youths in need of care. Additionally, it was not error for the District Court to rely on the testimony of a psychology expert, even though the testimony was based in part on hearsay, because the facts and data relied on by the expert were of the type typically relied on by experts in the field of psychology. Moreover, although the verbatim adoption of findings and conclusions of the prevailing party is not favored, the District Court in this case did not in fact adopt the state's findings and conclusions verbatim, but rather exercised independent factfinding judgment. In re A.R. & I.R., 2005 MT 23, 326 M 7, 107 P3d 457 (2005), distinguishing In re Inquiry Into J.L. & D.L., 2000 MT 289, 302 M 254, 14 P3d 473 (2000).

Adjudication Properly Based on Parents' Stipulation That Children Considered Youths in Need of Care: Following termination of their parental rights, the parents contended that termination was not proper because the children were never adjudicated as youths in need of care, which is the threshold for termination proceedings. Although there was no hearing at which that determination was made based on a preponderance of the evidence, under 41-3-434, a parent may stipulate that a child is a youth in need of care, and the parents in this case twice stipulated that their children were in need of care—once when they signed a stipulation to temporary legal custody and again when they signed a stipulation to the extension of temporary legal custody. Based on these stipulations and the holding in In Re Custody & Parental Rights of M.W. & C.S., 2001 MT 78, 305 M 80 (2001), the children were properly adjudicated as youths in need of care. In re M.B., J.B., & W.B., 2004 MT 304, 323 M 468, 100 P3d 1006 (2004).

Failure to Adjudicate Youth in Need of Care Precluding Termination of Parental Rights: A parent contended that parental rights were improperly terminated because the child was not properly adjudicated as a youth in need of care. The Supreme Court noted that such adjudication is a threshold requirement before a court may grant temporary legal custody, order a parental treatment plan, or terminate parental rights. The state argued that the child was found to be a youth in need of care during earlier guardianship proceedings in a different District Court. The Supreme Court cited In re F.M., 2002 MT 180, 311 M 35, 53 P3d 368 (2002), for the holding that evidence received at a hearing on a collateral matter, such as a guardianship proceeding, did not satisfy the adjudicatory requirements of this section (formerly numbered 41-3-404). Further, it was improper for the District Court to approve a treatment plan 10 months prior to proper adjudication of the child as a youth in need of care, in violation of 41-3-406 (renumbered 41-3-438) and 41-3-420 (renumbered 41-3-443), which also rendered the requirements of 41-3-609 unsatisfied. Because the child was not properly adjudicated a youth in need of care, court approval of a treatment plan was improper and termination of parental rights was reversed. In re B.N.Y., 2003 MT 241, 317 M 291, 77 P3d 189 (2003).

Sufficient Findings to Warrant Grant of Temporary Legal Custody: A mother appealed an order granting temporary legal custody of her child to the state. The Supreme Court held that an order of temporary legal custody is normally an interlocutory order subject to review pursuant to a writ of supervisory control, rather than by direct appeal. Nevertheless, in this case, the court decided to address the appeal as if it were a direct appeal because the state's motion to dismiss had been denied earlier. The court found sufficient evidence to support the order of temporary custody. Even though the mother did nothing wrong personally, she made mistakes concerning other people in her life that endangered her child's welfare. A finding that a parent personally caused a child's injuries is not necessary for a grant of temporary legal custody. A District Court may consider a child to be a youth in need of care regardless of the parent's care for the child or even whether actual abuse or neglect occurred. The temporary custody order was affirmed. In re D.A., 2003 MT 109, 315 M 340, 68 P3d 735 (2003).

Failure to Hold Adjudicatory Hearing to Determine Whether Children in Need of Care — Termination of Parental Rights Improper Absent Adjudication of Status of Children: The District Court held several hearings concerning temporary investigative authority, granting several extensions, and also held several hearings concerning granting temporary legal custody, which was extended twice. The state then filed a petition to terminate the mother's parental rights. Temporary legal custody was extended a third time pending a hearing on the termination hearing. At the hearing, the mother's parental rights were terminated, and she appealed. The Supreme Court found that there had never been an adjudicatory hearing at which the District Court heard testimony or received evidence concerning whether the children were abused or neglected. The hearing for temporary legal custody did not equate to an adjudication by the court that the children were youths in need of care, even in light of an alleged stipulation by the mother to that effect. Absent an adjudicatory hearing and an adjudication that the children were youths in need of care, termination of parental rights was improper, and the order was reversed. In re M.O., M.O., & M.O., 2003 MT 4, 314 M 13, 62 P3d 265 (2003).

Retention of Jurisdiction to Terminate Parental Rights — Findings of Abuse or Neglect in Temporary Legal Custody Stage Required: To retain jurisdiction to terminate parental rights under 41-3-609, a District Court must find by a preponderance of the evidence in the temporary legal custody stage under this section that the child is abused or neglected. The adjudication of a child as a youth in need of care cannot be established based on evidence received at the hearing on permanent legal custody. In its termination order, the court must conclude that it did not exceed its jurisdiction at any time during the course of the proceedings. If the court does not make a proper finding of abuse and neglect under this section, it will have exceeded its jurisdiction in waiting to make that determination until terminating parental rights under 41-3-609. In the present case, the District Court did not specifically state, pursuant to this section, that the children were youths in need of care, but the evidence upon which the court based its order granting temporary legal custody clearly demonstrated that the children had suffered actual harm and that they were in danger of substantial risk of harm to their health and welfare. The Supreme Court declined to disturb the findings of abuse and neglect, based on the District Court's language in its order extending the state's investigative authority. In re F.M. & D.M., 2002 MT 180, 311 M 35, 53 P3d 368 (2002).

Failure to Adjudicate Child as Youth in Need of Care — Termination of Parental Rights Improper: A mother was arrested for a parole violation, and the state filed a petition to investigate whether her children were abused or neglected. The District Court granted the petition on a preliminary basis, and the children were placed in a foster home. The mother was released on bond but failed to appear for a show cause hearing. The state's petition was then granted, and the court found that it was in the children's best interests to be removed from the home. The mother was later arrested again, released the following day, and left for Florida, leaving the children behind. She was arrested in Florida about 3 months later, and while incarcerated there, Montana filed for approval of a treatment plan. The treatment plan was faxed to the mother, but she refused to sign it. The plan was approved without her signature. A district citizen review board then recommended that the mother's parental rights be terminated based on the mother's criminal history, the social history of the case, and the children's need for permanence. The District Court terminated the mother's parental rights for failing to comply with the treatment plan, and the mother appealed. The Supreme Court held that termination of parental rights was in error because the children had never been adjudicated as youths in need of care through an adjudicatory hearing, as required by this section. A stipulation by the mother to let the court give temporary custody of the children to the state did not constitute a stipulation or an adjudication that the children were youths in need of care. In re T.C. & W.C., 2001 MT 264, 307 M 244, 37 P3d 70 (2001).

Stipulation Not Considered Sufficient Adjudication of Youth in Need of Care — Lack of Jurisdictional Prerequisite to Terminate Parental Rights: The mother entered into a stipulation with the state that her children were youths in need of care only upon several conditions: (1) her parental rights would remain intact; (2) the children would reside with their grandmother; (3) the Casey Family Program would manage the children's cases; (4) the mother would always have contact with the children even if the program was required to intervene between the mother and grandmother; and (5) at an appropriate time when the mother was ready, the program, the Department, and the mother would devise a treatment plan that would be completed by the mother in order to regain custody of the children. At a subsequent hearing, the Department proposed a permanency plan that involved removing the children from their grandmother. The mother contended that the proposal amounted to a failure to abide by the conditions of the stipulation, thereby voiding the conditional stipulation that the children were youths in need of care and precluding the District Court's authority to terminate her parental rights. The Supreme Court agreed. Although a stipulation may be an acceptable alternative to an adjudicatory hearing in many circumstances, the fundamental nature of the rights of a parent requires that the process by which a stipulation is drafted and signed needs to be closely scrutinized. In this case, the stipulation was drafted by the County Attorney and signed by the mother without the benefit of legal counsel and essentially allowed the court to determine that the youths were in need of care without a finding that they were abused or neglected and without a hearing as required by 41-3-402 (renumbered 41-3-427). The mother had conflicting feelings about the removal of the children from their grandmother's care and relied on her understanding from the stipulation that the Department would not remove the children or terminate her parental rights, so she did not complete her treatment plan. Only a few days after the initial hearing, she promptly began work toward completion of the treatment plan and had made significant progress, particularly considering the unexpected death of her mother, by the time of the next hearing. Despite the change in circumstances resulting from the death, the Department did not grant the mother any additional time to complete the treatment plan, nor did the Department offer any evidence that the mother had abused or neglected the children. Under the unique facts of this case, the Supreme Court held that the District Court incorrectly found that the stipulation sufficed as an adjudication that the children were youths in need of care. Without that adjudication, the District Court lacked the jurisdictional prerequisite to terminate the mother's parental rights, so the Supreme Court reversed. In Re Custody and Parental Rights of M.W. & C.S., 2001 MT 78, 305 M 80, 23 P3d 206 (2001).

Finding That Child Is Youth in Need of Care Prerequisite to Transfer of Custody: The exigent protection of the health and welfare of a child is paramount when the state's initial intervention into otherwise private family matters reveals an actual or potentially dangerous or unhealthy environment requiring the removal of the child from a custodial caregiver. The legal determination that a child is a youth in need of care is a jurisdictional prerequisite for a court-ordered transfer of custody. The first question in a termination proceeding is whether the District Court correctly adjudicated the child as a youth in need of care, and the state need only offer clear and convincing evidence that the court properly adjudicated the child as a youth in need of care in order for the court to inquire into the actual fitness of the parent. In re A.M., 2001 MT 60, 304 M 379, 22 P3d 185 (2001).

Lack of District Court Jurisdiction to Place Children Found Not to Be Abused or Neglected Remedied by Stipulation for Placement of Children: After the temporary investigative authority (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427) and temporary legal custody of the Department of Public Health and Human Services were terminated by the District Court, the District Court retained jurisdiction over the placement of the children in question pursuant to a stipulation placing those children with the parents of a father who pleaded guilty to negligent homicide. The Department argued, citing In re M.P.M. & A.R.M., 1999 MT 78, 294 M 87, 976 P2d 988 (1999), that once the District Court found that the children were not abused or neglected, it lost jurisdiction over the case and therefore could not retain jurisdiction. The Supreme Court held that the District Court properly retained jurisdiction because retention of jurisdiction was based upon a stipulation granting custody of the children to the father's parents and the stipulation provided for the retention of jurisdiction by the District Court. In re Inquiry Into J.L. & D.L., 2000 MT 289, 302 M 254, 14 P3d 473, 57 St. Rep. 1219 (2000).

Dismissal of Petition for Temporary Investigative Authority (See 2001 Amendment to 41-3-427) Without Review of Guardianship Action — Harmless Error in Light of Requirements of Indian Child Welfare Act: In compliance with 41-3-403 (renumbered 41-3-423), the District Court ordered a show cause hearing at which to consider a petition for temporary investigative authority (TIA) (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427—now "immediate protection and emergency protective services") regarding two Indian children. At the hearing, the Deputy County Attorney offered an order and memorandum from a previously dismissed guardianship proceeding as evidence. The court did not admit the documentation as evidence, but took judicial notice of it. However, at the end of the hearing, the court dismissed the petition for TIA (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427—now "immediate protection and emergency protective services") without reviewing any records from the guardianship proceeding and ordered the Department of Public Health and Human Services to immediately place the children with their father. The mother contended that it was error to dismiss the petition without reviewing the guardianship file. In order for courts to grant TIA (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427—now "immediate protection and emergency protective services") petitions when Indian children are involved, the requirements of the Indian Child Welfare Act must be met. Under 25 U.S.C. 1912, active efforts must be made to provide remedial services and rehabilitation programs to prevent the breakup of the Indian family. In addition, any finding that continued custody of the child by the parent or Indian custodian is likely to result in serious emotional or physical damage to the child must be based on the testimony of qualified expert witnesses. Because these requirements were not met, the court could not have granted TIA (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427—now "immediate protection and emergency protective services") even if it had reviewed the guardianship file, so its failure to do so, if erroneous, was harmless. In re M.P.M. & A.R.M., 1999 MT 78, 294 M 87, 976 P2d 988, 56 St. Rep. 327 (1999).

Error in Placing Custody With One Parent Following Dismissal of Petition for Temporary Investigative Authority (See 2001 Amendment to 41-3-427): In compliance with 41-3-403 (renumbered 41-3-423), the District Court ordered a show cause hearing at which to consider a petition for temporary investigative authority (TIA) (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427—now "immediate protection and emergency protective services") regarding two Indian children. At the end of the hearing, the court dismissed the petition for TIA (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427—now "immediate protection and emergency protective services") and ordered the Department of Public Health and Human Services to immediately place the children with their father. The Department argued on appeal that the court exceeded its authority in ordering transfer of custody to the father after the petition for TIA (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427—now "immediate protection and emergency protective services") was dismissed. The Supreme Court held that when the District Court vacated the orders issued following filing of the petition for TIA (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427—now "immediate protection and emergency protective services"), it did not have authority to place custody with the father because nothing in the statutory framework or legislative intent authorizes the placement of a child with one parent, as opposed to the other, following dismissal of a petition for TIA (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427—now "immediate protection and emergency protective services"). The order transferring custody to the father was reversed. In re M.P.M. & A.R.M., 1999 MT 78, 294 M 87, 976 P2d 988, 56 St. Rep. 327 (1999), distinguished in In re Inquiry Into J.L. & D.L., 2000 MT 289, 302 M 254, 14 P3d 473, 57 St. Rep. 1219 (2000).

Stipulation That Child Is Youth in Need of Care — Court Discretion to Determine Custody: Under 41-3-404 (renumbered 41-3-437) and 41-3-406 (renumbered 41-3-438), a parent's stipulation that a child is a youth in need of care empowers a District Court, in its discretion, to transfer legal custody of the child from the parent to the Department of Public Health and Human Services pursuant to In re C.M., 281 M 183, 932 P2d 1063 (1997). In re J.H., R.H., D.H., & R.H., 1998 MT 128, 289 M 111, 958 P2d 1191, 55 St. Rep. 504 (1998).

Court Not to Take Judicial Notice of Hearing at Which Parties Not Represented by Counsel: The Streckerts were not present or represented at a hearing by the lower court determining temporary custody of their children. Subsequently, during a hearing terminating parental rights, the District Court took judicial notice of the testimony presented during the temporary custody hearing. The Supreme Court held that the lower court should not have taken judicial notice of evidence presented in the first hearing but refused to reverse the decision on the basis that there was substantial other evidence to support the lower court's ruling. In re D.S., H.S., R.S., R.S., J.S., R.S., & K.S., 253 M 484, 833 P2d 1090, 49 St. Rep. 552 (1992).

Hearsay Testimony as Only Evidence of Abuse or Neglect — Dismissal Proper: When the bulk of testimony elicited from a social worker and guardian ad litem at a show cause hearing on abuse and neglect was hearsay and when even the state conceded that no evidence was offered to establish probable cause that the children were abused or neglected, consideration of the testimony by the District Court constituted reversible error. The petition was dismissed without prejudice, and the children were returned to their parents pending further proceedings. In re B.S. & J.S., 252 M 435, 829 P2d 939, 49 St. Rep. 338 (1992).

Adjudicatory and Dispositional Hearing Combined — Notice Not Required: Parental rights may be terminated at a dispositional hearing under 41-3-406 (renumbered 41-3-438) and 41-3-607. The dispositional hearing was combined with an adjudicatory hearing under 41-3-404 (renumbered 41-3-437), and no specific notice of the combination was required. Custody of R.A.D., 44 St. Rep. 2018 (1987). Opinion withdrawn but issue affirmed in Custody of R.A.D. & J.D., 231 M 143, 753 P2d 862, 45 St. Rep. 496 (1988).

Only Show Cause Hearing Required Upon Filing Petition for Temporary Investigative Authority (See 2001 Amendment to 41-3-427): A mother contended that an order granting temporary custody to the state and allowing temporary investigative authority (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427—now "immediate protection and emergency protective services") under 41-3-404 (renumbered 41-3-437) should be vacated for lack of an adjudicatory hearing pursuant to 41-3-404 (renumbered 41-3-437) and a dispositional hearing pursuant to 41-3-406 (renumbered 41-3-438). In denying the motion to vacate, the District Court properly held that a show cause hearing is the only hearing required when a petition for temporary investigative authority (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427—now "immediate protection and emergency protective services") is filed. In re J.W. & J.C., 226 M 491, 736 P2d 960, 44 St. Rep. 843 (1987).

In-Chambers Interview — Record Required: A District Court may conduct an in-chambers interview of children in an abuse, neglect, and dependency (see 1995 amendment) proceeding. A record must be made of any interview conducted. In re M.L.H., H.M.H., & R.H., 220 M 288, 715 P2d 32, 43 St. Rep. 375 (1986).

Mere Presence of Hearsay Evidence in Court File Not Reversible Error: The presence in the court file of statements not supported by testimony is not a violation of due process or error when: (1) the authors of the reports did testify and were subject to cross-examination; (2) no evidence was presented to rebut the presumption that any hearsay within the reports themselves was disregarded by the District Court; and (3) the court explicitly based its findings upon the testimony of the witnesses and upon the reports of only those who testified. In re M.L.H., H.M.H., & R.H., 220 M 288, 715 P2d 32, 43 St. Rep. 375 (1986).

Evidence of Sexual Abuse — Treatment Plan Ordered: Acting on evidence of sexual abuse and other problems within the family, the trial court properly found S.L.T. to be an abused and neglected child. The court granted temporary custody to the county welfare department and required that the child and her parents follow a treatment plan submitted by the welfare department. Section 41-3-404 (renumbered 41-3-437) gives the trial court authority to order any of the forms of relief listed in 41-3-403 (renumbered 41-3-423) once the court determines a child is abused or neglected. This includes the relief ordered in this case. In re S.L.T., 215 M 289, 697 P2d 472, 42 St. Rep. 366 (1985).

Family Unity Not to Be Preserved at Expense of Children's Best Interests: After an adjudicatory hearing, the District Court terminated the parental rights of the parents of five children and granted custody with authority to consent to adoption to the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services). Under Department placement, the children would be separated from each other. The paternal grandmother appealed to the Supreme Court, claiming that the state policy of preserving the unity and welfare of the family as set forth in 41-3-101 was violated by the separation of the children and by the District Court's refusal to award the children to her. The Supreme Court affirmed because the District Court's findings indicated that it had considered the grandmother's request but that the overriding concern was and ought to have been the best interests of the children. In re M.N., 199 M 407, 649 P2d 749, 39 St. Rep. 1487 (1982).

Competency in Criminal Matter Not Determinative in Civil Matter: The Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) filed a petition in District Court alleging that J. H. was a youth in need of care. The boy, his mother, and a social worker all testified that the father sexually abused the boy. The youth was found to be an abused and neglected child. The father claimed that since he was declared unfit to proceed in a collateral criminal action he was also unfit to proceed in the civil action. The Supreme Court found nothing in the record to indicate the father was declared unfit to proceed in anything except the criminal action. He had the burden of proving his incompetence. With no affirmative showing of incompetence to proceed in the civil action, the court presumed the father competent. In re J.H., 196 M 482, 640 P2d 445, 39 St. Rep. 267 (1982).

Dispositional Hearing Required: The Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) filed a petition in District Court alleging that J. H. was a youth in need of care. The boy, his mother, and a social worker all testified that the father sexually abused the boy. The court found the boy abused and neglected but failed to hold a dispositional hearing. The Supreme Court found that dispositional hearings are required but that because a separate dispositional hearing had been held in a juvenile matter and the boy was placed at the Yellowstone Boys Ranch, the failure was harmless error in this case. In re J.H., 196 M 482, 640 P2d 445, 39 St. Rep. 267 (1982).

Youth in Need of Care Proceeding — Spouse May Testify — Section Constitutional: The Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) filed a petition in District Court alleging that J. H. was a youth in need of care. The boy, his mother, and a social worker all testified that the father sexually abused the boy. The father contended that the wife's testimony was a violation of the spousal privilege. The Supreme Court held the wife could testify. The purpose of the spousal privilege is to protect the sanctity of the marriage and home. However, once a family member has been sexually abused, the sanctity of the home and the reason for the rule have been destroyed. Sexual abuse of the son by the father is also a special wrong to the wife and has particularly and directly affected her in a manner other than that suffered by the public in general. Thus, the wrong against the child is nothing more or less than a wrong against the other spouse. As such it falls into one of the exceptions to the spousal privilege. The father claimed that it was unclear whether 41-3-404 (renumbered 41-3-437) allows parents to testify in youth in need of care proceedings and therefore 41-3-404

(renumbered 41-3-437) was unconstitutionally vague. The court, having found that the wife could testify against the husband, determined that the statute was not void due to vagueness. In re J.H., 196 M 482, 640 P2d 445, 39 St. Rep. 267 (1982).

Indian Child Welfare Act — Effective Date: A proceeding for termination of parental rights initiated in state court prior to May 7, 1979, the effective date of the Indian Child Welfare Act of 1978 (25 U.S.C. §1901, et seq.) continues as a state proceeding, not subject to the transfer provisions to tribal court under the Act, even though, due to a bifurcation of hearings involving several fathers, one of these hearings was held after the effective date of the Act. In re T.J.D., J.L.D. & R.J.W., 189 M 147, 615 P2d 212 (1980).

One Proceeding With Two Hearings — Failure to Object Again — Waiver of Error: In a child abuse and neglect proceeding to terminate parental rights when the father of the youngest child was to have his rights determined a month after a hearing involving the termination of both parents' rights to the two elder children, the father of the youngest child waived his right to complain of error on appeal because he failed to object to questions by the judge at the second hearing involving a prior felony conviction, even though objection was made and overruled in the first hearing. In re T.J.D., J.L.D. & R.J.W., 189 M 147, 615 P2d 212 (1980).

Abuse or Neglect — Sufficiency of Evidence: The District Court did not abuse its discretion in declaring a child abused or neglected where the child's only known parent had been confined to a state hospital for 6 years, had suffered from organic brain dysfunction since birth, experienced delusions, and her condition had been diagnosed as paranoid schizophrenia with no hope of significant improvement in the foreseeable future. In re C.M.S., A Dependent and Neglected Child, 187 M 115, 609 P2d 240 (1979). See also In re C.L.A. & J.A., 211 M 393, 685 P2d 931, 41 St. Rep. 1444 (1984).

Dependency — Sufficiency of Evidence: The District Court did not abuse its discretion in finding a child dependent (see 1995 amendment) where the child's only known natural parent, possessed with a $40,000 estate, had not contributed to the child's support in any substantial way, and because of her mental condition could not provide the proper guidance for the child's necessary physical, moral, and emotional well-being. In re C.M.S., A Dependent and Neglected Child, 187 M 115, 609 P2d 240 (1979).

Protection of Family Unit: Although it is the function of the District Court to protect the unity of the family, family unity was not a factor when the child's only known natural parent had been confined to a state hospital and the child had been placed in a foster home since birth. The child had never had a viable parent-child relationship with her mother and had never seen or been associated with her natural mother. In re C.M.S., A Dependent and Neglected Child, 187 M 115, 609 P2d 240 (1979).

Scope of Review: The findings of the District Court in an abuse or neglect action enjoy a presumption of correctness and will not be overturned unless unsupported by credible evidence that would amount to a clear abuse of discretion. In re C.M.S., A Dependent and Neglected Child, 187 M 115, 609 P2d 240 (1979), following In re G., Youth in Need of Care, 174 M 321, 570 P2d 1110 (1977).

Termination of Parental Rights: When the following things were considered, the record supported the conclusions that the father's rights were adequately considered prior to termination of parental rights and that the decision to terminate them was supported by credible evidence: (1) the father was notified of the hearing, was present, and was represented by counsel; (2) professional testimony indicated the father would not be able to provide enough influence to offset the marked deprivation anticipated to continue for the child; (3) the father was found to have made no effort to assist the mother in learning to become a good parent; (4) the father had visited the child only once in 6 months when the child was in a foster home and had been reported to have abused the child. In re L.F.G., 183 M 239, 598 P2d 1125 (1979).

Youth in Need — Best Interests of Child — Mental Condition of Parent as Sole Factor: When the District Court considered the best interests of a child after first determining that the child was in fact abused or neglected, it met the required standard. Considering the mental condition of the mother as the primary if not the sole factor, but having evidence that the child would not receive even minimally satisfactory maternal care and would be exposed to extremely high chances of developing a mental condition similar to that of the mother, sufficient credible evidence was before the District Court to support the District Court's decision that the child was a youth in need of care. The Supreme Court rejected the view that mental condition of a parent could not be the sole factor supporting a severance of parental rights. In re L.F.G., 183 M 239, 598 P2d 1125 (1979).

Individual Parental Rights: In addition to their rights as a couple, parents have individual rights with respect to their children, which rights must be given adequate consideration in abuse, neglect, or dependency proceedings. In re Declaring T.E.R. Youth in Need of Care, 180 M 340, 590 P2d 1117 (1979), followed in In re J.B., 278 M 160, 923 P2d 1096, 53 St. Rep. 901 (1996).

2009 Amendments — Composite Section: Chapter 179 in (3)(e) at end substituted "41-1-503" for "41-1-501". Amendment effective October 1, 2009.

Chapter 210 inserted (4)(a)(iii) concerning continuity of care as a factor in awarding temporary legal custody; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2009.

2007 Amendment: Chapter 73 inserted (3)(b) regarding evaluation of the noncustodial parent as a possible caretaker; inserted (3)(c) regarding temporary placement of the child with the noncustodial parent and keeping the proceeding open pending completion of any court-ordered treatment plan; in (3)(f)(iii) at beginning after "a" inserted "nonparent" and after "individual who" inserted "has been evaluated"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2007.

2005 Amendments — Composite Section: Chapter 178 inserted (4)(c) requiring department to investigate and determine if awarding custody to family member is in child's best interest, requiring court to inform family member denied custody of reasons for denial, and requiring court to provide reasons for denial in the court order upon request. Amendment effective October 1, 2005.

Chapter 382 in (6) near middle after "permanency" deleted "plan". Amendment effective April 25, 2005.

2003 Amendment: Chapter 504 in (1) near end of second sentence substituted "stipulation by the parties pursuant to 41-3-434" for "in the notification of parties"; inserted (2)(c) concerning timing of dispositional hearing; in (3)(a) near middle before "parent" inserted "custodial"; inserted (3)(b) concerning placement with noncustodial parent; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2003.

2001 Amendments — Composite Section — Coordination: Chapter 194 inserted (4) regarding award of temporary legal custody of abandoned child; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2001.

Chapter 281 inserted (1) requiring a dispositional hearing on every petition within 20 days after entry of an adjudicatory order; inserted (2) requiring a dispositional order, setting out the procedure at a dispositional hearing, and allowing a bifurcated hearing; deleted former (2) that read: "(2) To grant temporary legal custody, the court shall make a finding that:

(a) dismissing the petition would create a substantial risk of harm to the child or detriment to the child's physical or psychological well-being; and

(b) unless there is a finding that reasonable efforts are not required pursuant to 41-3-403, reasonable services have been provided to the parent or guardian to prevent the removal of the child from the home or to make it possible for the child to safely return home"; in (6) near beginning after "pursuant to" substituted "41-3-442(1) or subsection (5) of this section" for "subsection (2) or (3)"; deleted former (5) through (7) that read: "(5) An order for temporary legal custody may be in effect for no longer than 6 months. Before the expiration of the order for temporary legal custody, the county attorney, the attorney general, or an attorney hired by the county shall petition for one of the following:

(a) an extension of temporary legal custody, not to exceed a total of 6 months, upon a showing that additional time is necessary for the parent or guardian to successfully complete a treatment plan;

(b) termination of the parent-child legal relationship and either:

(i) permanent legal custody with the right of adoption; or

(ii) appointment of a guardian pursuant to 41-3-607;

(c) long-term custody pursuant to 41-3-412;

(d) appointment of a guardian pursuant to 41-3-421; or

(e) dismissal.

(6) The court may continue an order for temporary legal custody pending a hearing on a petition provided for in subsection (5).

(7) If an extension of temporary legal custody is granted to the department, the court shall state the reasons why the child was not returned home and the conditions upon which the child may be returned home"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2001.

Chapter 311 in (3), (3)(a), (3)(b), and (3)(c) substituted references to child for references to youth; in (3)(d) at end of first sentence substituted "consents and informs the court that resources are available for payment" for "is notified and a court hearing is set in a timely manner on the proposed expenditure"; in (3)(e) substituted "consents and informs the court that resources are available for the proposed care and treatment" for "is notified and a court hearing is set in a timely manner on the proposed expenditure"; and in (6) near beginning substituted "permanency plan hearing" for "permanency hearing". Amendment effective October 1, 2001.

The amendment to former subsection (7) of this section made by sec. 9, Ch. 311, L. 2001, was rendered void by sec. 18(3), Ch. 281, L. 2001, a coordination section.

Applicability: Section 8, Ch. 194, L. 2001, provided: "[This act] applies to proceedings on petitions filed pursuant to 41-3-401 [now 41-3-422] after October 1, 2001."

Saving Clause: Section 19, Ch. 281, L. 2001, was a saving clause.

1999 Amendments — Composite Section: Chapter 428 in (5)(b)(ii) at beginning inserted "appointment of a guardian"; inserted (5)(d) relating to appointment of a guardian pursuant to 41-3-421; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 1999.

Chapter 566 in (2)(a) at beginning substituted "dismissing the petition" for "returning the child to the child's parent or guardian" and substituted "psychological well-being" for "emotional well-being"; in (2)(b) at beginning inserted "unless there is a finding that reasonable efforts are not required pursuant to 41-3-403" and at end inserted "or to make it possible for the child to safely return home"; deleted former (3) that read: "(3) In making a finding regarding the risk of harm to the child or regarding detriment to the child, failure of the child's parent or guardian to participate in, to comply with, in whole or in part, or to meet the goals of a court-ordered treatment plan constitutes prima facie evidence that return of the child to the parent or guardian would be detrimental to the child's physical or emotional well-being"; inserted (3) requiring department to make reasonable efforts to permanently place child if court determines efforts to return child to home are inconsistent with permanency plan; inserted (4) requiring permanency hearing to be conducted within 30 days after determination that reasonable efforts to return child to home are not necessary and requiring finalization of placement; in (5)(a) after "custody" inserted "not to exceed a total of 6 months"; inserted (5)(c) authorizing petition for long-term custody; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 1999.

1997 Amendment: Chapter 516 in (1)(a), after "youth's", substituted "parent" for "parents"; in (1)(c), after "transfer", inserted "temporary"; in (1)(c)(ii), at beginning after "a", inserted "licensed"; in (1)(c)(iii), near beginning after "who", substituted "is recommended" for "after study"; in (1)(e), near middle of first sentence after "best", substituted "interests of the child" for "interest of the youth" and at end of second sentence inserted "pursuant to 41-3-411"; inserted (2) regarding required court findings; inserted (3) establishing that failure by a parent or guardian to comply with a treatment plan constitutes prima facie evidence that return of the child to the parent or guardian would be detrimental; inserted (4) limiting the time of a temporary legal custody extension; inserted (5) allowing continuance of an order for temporary legal custody; inserted (6) concerning reasons for extending temporary legal custody; inserted (7) requiring the court to review reasons why time limits have not been met and to order an appropriate remedy; deleted former (2) through (6) that read: "(2) If the youth is transferred to the custody of the department, the court shall examine the financial ability of the youth's parents or guardians to pay a contribution covering all or part of the costs for the care, custody, and treatment of the youth, including the costs of necessary medical, dental, and other health care.

(3) If the court determines that the youth's parents or guardians are financially able to pay a contribution as provided in subsection (2), the court shall order the youth's parents or guardians to pay an amount based on the uniform child support guidelines adopted by the department of public health and human services pursuant to 40-5-209.

(4) (a) Except as provided in subsection (4)(b), contributions ordered under this section and each modification of an existing order are enforceable by immediate or delinquency income withholding, or both, under Title 40, chapter 5, part 4. An order for a contribution that is inconsistent with this section is nevertheless subject to withholding for the payment of the contribution without need for an amendment of the support order or for any further action by the court.

(b) A court-ordered exception from contributions under this section must be in writing and be included in the order. An exception from the immediate income withholding requirement may be granted if the court finds that there is:

(i) good cause not to require immediate income withholding; or

(ii) an alternative arrangement between the department and the person who is ordered to pay contributions.

(c) A finding of good cause not to require immediate income withholding must, at a minimum, be based upon:

(i) a written determination and explanation by the court of the reasons why the implementation of immediate income withholding is not in the best interests of the child; and

(ii) proof of timely payment of previously ordered support in cases involving modification of contributions ordered under this section.

(d) An alternative arrangement must:

(i) provide sufficient security to ensure compliance with the arrangement;

(ii) be in writing and be signed by a representative of the department and the person required to make contributions; and

(iii) if approved by the court, be entered into the record of the proceeding.

(5) Upon a showing of a change in the financial ability of the youth's parents or guardians to pay, the court may modify its order for the payment of contributions required under subsection (3).

(6) (a) If the court orders the payment of contributions under this section, the department shall apply to the department of public health and human services for support enforcement services pursuant to Title IV-D of the Social Security Act.

(b) The department of public health and human services may collect and enforce a contribution order under this section by any means available under law, including the remedies provided for in Title 40, chapter 5, parts 2 and 4."

Applicability: Section 20, Ch. 516, L. 1997, provided that this section applies to proceedings commenced on or after October 1, 1997.

1995 Amendments: Chapter 458 in (1)(c)(iii) substituted "the department or a licensed child-placing" for "a social service". Amendment effective April 14, 1995.

Chapter 546 in (3), (6)(a), and (6)(b) substituted "department of public health and human services" for "department of social and rehabilitation services". Amendment effective July 1, 1995.

Saving Clause: Section 571, Ch. 546, L. 1995, was a saving clause.

1993 Amendment: Chapter 362 in (1)(c)(i), after "department", deleted "of family services"; in (1)(d), at end after "counseling", and in (1)(e), at end after "youth", inserted "that does not require an expenditure of money by the department unless the department is notified and a court hearing is set in a timely manner on the proposed expenditure. The department is the payor of last resort after all family, insurance, and other resources have been examined"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 16, 1993.

1991 Amendment: In (1), near beginning, substituted "a youth in need of care" for "abused, neglected, or dependent" and after "court" deleted "after the dispositional hearing"; inserted (2) through (6) regarding determination of the financial ability of parents or guardians to contribute to costs for care, custody, and treatment of a youth and regarding methods of contribution for those costs; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1991.

1987 Amendment: Substituted "department of family services" for "department of social and rehabilitation services".

1985 Amendment: In (2) at end substituted "41-3-408" for "[section 5]"; and deleted former (2) through (5) that read: "(2) Whenever the court vests legal custody in any agency, institution, or department, it shall transmit with the dispositional judgment copies of any medical report and such other clinical, predisposition, or other reports and information as may be pertinent to the care and treatment of the youth.

(3) Any youth found to be abused, neglected, or dependent may be committed or the court may make such other disposition of the child as the court deems best for his social and physical welfare. The form of commitment shall be as follows:

ORDER OF COMMITMENT

State of Montana)
) ss.
County of ....)

In the district court for the .... Judicial District.

On the .... day of ...., 19.., ..., minor of this county, was charged on the petition of ...., county attorney of .... County, with being an abused or neglected or dependent child. Upon due proof I find that it is for the best interests of the child that he be taken from the custody of his parents, guardian, or other person having custody of him.

The names, addresses, and occupations of the parents are:

Name	Address	Occupation
.....	.....	.....
.....	.....	.....

The child's guardian is ..... The child is in the custody of .....

It is ordered that .... be committed to .... until discharged as provided by law.

Witness my hand this .... day of ...., A.D. 19...

Judge

(4) Transfer of legal custody of a child shall include guardianship of any assets or estate of the child, unless otherwise specified by the court.

(5) Except in cases in which the court permanently terminates all parental rights or rights of the guardian of the youth, the court shall retain jurisdiction over the case and may subsequently modify any disposition ordered pursuant to this section."

1983 Amendment: Inserted (1)(b) allowing court to grant limited emancipation to abused youth 16 years of age or older.

1981 Amendment: In former (3) (now deleted), deleted reference to the Montana children's center.

Case Notes

Dismissal of Parenting Action Following Placement of Children Under Permanency Plan — Appeal Moot: While a parenting action was pending in Flathead County, a District Court in Missoula County approved a permanency plan that placed the children in California with the mother. The father did not appeal the placement order. The Flathead County action was subsequently dismissed, and the father appealed. The Supreme Court held that the Flathead County order was moot because the state no longer possessed authority over the custody and placement of the children, and in the absence of an ongoing, concrete controversy, effective relief could not be granted. The appeal was dismissed. In re J.A.S. & E.R.S., 2008 MT 269, 345 M 189, 190 P3d 299 (2008).

Separate Dispositional Hearing Not Required When Parental Stipulations Made Regarding Adjudication and Placement of Children and Treatment Plans: Under this section, a separate dispositional hearing is not required if parental stipulations are entered pursuant to 41-3-434. In this case, the parents stipulated to their children being youths in need of care, to the children being placed in temporary state custody, and to signing treatment plans. Given the parents' stipulations to the pertinent dispositional issues, a separate dispositional hearing was not required. In re B.B. & J.B., 2006 MT 66, 331 M 407, 133 P3d 215 (2006).

Erroneous Award of Custody at Adjudicatory Hearing Cured by Immediate Scheduling of Dispositional Hearing to Address Dispositional Issue Separately: The District Court failed to structure dispositional issues apart from adjudicatory issues when it granted temporary legal custody of two children to the state during an adjudicatory hearing. However, upon discovering the error, the court immediately scheduled a dispositional hearing to address the dispositional issue separately. Although not excusing the error, the Supreme Court held that holding a second dispositional hearing made the initial order placing the children with the state during the adjudicatory hearing the functional equivalent to an order of placement pending the dispositional hearing because temporary placement outside the home is allowed at every stage of the proceeding pursuant to 41-3-301, 41-3-432, and 41-3-437. The error was harmless and nonprejudicial and did not warrant reversal. In re S.C. & L.Z., 2005 MT 241, 328 M 476, 121 P3d 552 (2005).

No Improper Bifurcation of Adjudicatory and Dispositional Hearings Based on Noticed Testimony From Earlier Show Cause Hearing: A parent argued that adjudicatory and dispositional hearings were improperly bifurcated because the District Court took notice of and improperly relied upon expert testimony offered at an earlier show cause hearing. The state argued that a court may take notice of the records of any court in the state. The Supreme Court noted that the District Court allowed the parent to move for reconsideration at the hearing of its judicial notice of testimony from the previous hearing, but the parent did not move for reconsideration. Because the District Court also determined that there was sufficient evidence at the later hearing, without reliance on the noticed testimony, to sustain a finding of abuse and neglect and because the parent did not establish that use of the noticed testimony was a disadvantage, no error was demonstrated. In re S.C. & L.Z., 2005 MT 241, 328 M 476, 121 P3d 552 (2005).

Placement of Children With Noncustodial Parent Proper — Parental Rights Not Terminated: A mother contended that her due process rights were violated when the children were adjudicated as youths in need of care and the state placed the children with their father. The Supreme Court declined to address the due process claims because they were raised for the first time on appeal, and the court affirmed the placement. The mother's parental rights were not terminated; rather, the District Court followed the statutory procedure in this section after finding that placement with the father was in the children's best interests. The state took the necessary steps to ensure safe placement as required in the Interstate Placement of Children Compact, and the state was properly relieved of any further obligation once the concern for the children being youths in need of care was eliminated by the placement. In re A.C., T.C., & C.W., 2004 MT 320, 324 M 58, 101 P3d 761 (2004).

Failure to Adjudicate Youth in Need of Care Precluding Termination of Parental Rights: A parent contended that parental rights were improperly terminated because the child was not properly adjudicated as a youth in need of care. The Supreme Court noted that such adjudication is a threshold requirement before a court may grant temporary legal custody, order a parental treatment plan, or terminate parental rights. The state argued that the child was found to be a youth in need of care during earlier guardianship proceedings in a different District Court. The Supreme Court cited In re F.M., 2002 MT 180, 311 M 35, 53 P3d 368 (2002), for the holding that evidence received at a hearing on a collateral matter, such as a guardianship proceeding, did not satisfy the adjudicatory requirements of 41-3-404 (renumbered 41-3-437). Further, it was improper for the District Court to approve a treatment plan 10 months prior to proper adjudication of the child as a youth in need of care, in violation of 41-3-420 (renumbered 41-3-443) and this section (formerly numbered 41-3-406), which also rendered the requirements of 41-3-609 unsatisfied. Because the child was not properly adjudicated a youth in need of care, court approval of a treatment plan was improper and termination of parental rights was reversed. In re B.N.Y., 2003 MT 241, 317 M 291, 77 P3d 189 (2003).

No Standing by Former Parent to Object to Child's Placement or Assert Child's Rights: Once the parent-child relationship is terminated by the District Court, a former parent has no standing to object to the court's subsequent placement of the child with the Department or by adoption. Similarly, a former parent has no standing to assert a violation of the child's rights as guardian ad litem because the former parent no longer represents the child. In re E.A.T. & T.A.T., 1999 MT 281, 296 M 535, 989 P2d 860, 56 St. Rep. 1133 (1999).

Stipulation That Child Is Youth in Need of Care — Court Discretion to Determine Custody: Under 41-3-404 (renumbered 41-3-437) and 41-3-406 (renumbered 41-3-438), a parent's stipulation that a child is a youth in need of care empowers a District Court, in its discretion, to transfer legal custody of the child from the parent to the Department of Public Health and Human Services pursuant to In re C.M., 281 M 183, 932 P2d 1063 (1997). In re J.H., R.H., D.H., & R.H., 1998 MT 128, 289 M 111, 958 P2d 1191, 55 St. Rep. 504 (1998).

No Indication of Foreseeable Change in Parenting Skill Despite State-Provided Services — Permanent Department Custody of Children Affirmed: Once a youth is determined to be in need of care, the District Court can take appropriate measures to safeguard the welfare of the youth, including transfer of legal custody of the youth to the state. The youth's best interests are paramount and take precedence over parental rights. In the present case, the mother was shown to be unable and unwilling to remedy the circumstances that placed her children at risk and was not motivated to become an adequate parent despite the best efforts of the state to provide her with services and assistance in parenting, which brought no appreciable improvement. The District Court did not err in transferring permanent custody of the children to the Department of Public Health and Human Services. In re C.M., F.M., & S.M., 281 M 183, 932 P2d 1063, 54 St. Rep. 126 (1997), followed in In re J.H., R.H., D.H., & R.H., 1998 MT 128, 289 M 111, 958 P2d 1191, 55 St. Rep. 504 (1998), and In re R.T., 2005 MT 173, 327 M 498, 116 P3d 783 (2005). See also In re Custody & Parental Rights of F.M. & S.M., 2001 MT 93, 305 M 189, 24 P3d 208 (2001), in which the termination of parental rights to two of the children was affirmed absent evidence that the mother had made any significant progress in her ability to parent.

Award of Permanent Legal Custody — Authority of Court to Award Custody — Best Interests of Child Standard: The Department of Family Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) filed a petition requesting the court to terminate parental rights of Mary Ann G. and to grant the Department permanent legal custody of J.J.G., with the right to consent to adoption. Former foster parents of J.J.G. filed a petition seeking permanent custody of the child. The court dismissed the foster parents' petition on grounds that the court could only review the placement actions of the Department but could not make the permanent placement itself. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that the lower court erred when it concluded that the foster parents were without legal authority to seek custody of the child and that the lower court had no option other than to grant custody to the Department. The District Court has discretionary authority to transfer legal custody to any qualified individual, including nonrelatives, in order to protect the welfare of the child. In re J.J.G., 266 M 274, 880 P2d 808, 51 St. Rep. 793 (1994), followed in In re E.A.T. & T.A.T., 1999 MT 281, 296 M 535, 989 P2d 860, 56 St. Rep. 1133 (1999).

Dispositional Hearing — Procedures to Be Rigorously Followed — Error for Court to State Its Intentions Before Evidence Presented: In a dispositional hearing on petitions by the Department of Family Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) and former foster parents for permanent custody of a child, the District Court stated its intention to transfer custody to DFS several times prior to the time that evidence was considered at the dispositional hearing. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that the evidence received at the hearing was essentially disregarded by the District Court and that the hearing itself was a mere formality. This was error, and the lower court was reversed. In re J.J.G., 266 M 274, 880 P2d 808, 51 St. Rep. 793 (1994).

Proof of Sexual Abuse Not Necessary to Conclusion That Child Is Youth in Need of Care: A finding that a child was sexually abused was not a prerequisite to a conclusion that the child was a youth in need of care warranting placement of the child with the Department of Family Services. The conclusion was proper in light of the combination of the testimony of four expert witnesses, a video deposition of the child, a series of nude photos of the child taken by the parents, evidence of spousal physical abuse in the presence of the child, and the fact that the father did not provide as evidence the results of his court-ordered psychological evaluation. In re H.D., 256 M 70, 844 P2d 114, 49 St. Rep. 1141 (1992).

Marriage and Divorce Law Inapplicable to Nonparent Seeking Child Custody: As part of a change in custody proceeding conducted under the marriage and divorce statutes, the District Court erred in granting to a nonparent the custody of a child who was neither a natural child nor adopted. The proper procedure to be followed is contained in the child abuse, neglect, and dependency statutes. Although the nonparent apparently fit the requirements for custodian under either scenario, the case was remanded for correct procedural consideration under this chapter. In re Marriage of Miller, 251 M 300, 825 P2d 189, 49 St. Rep. 36 (1992), following In re Doney, 174 M 282, 570 P2d 575 (1977), and overruling a contrary prior holding in In re Custody of C.C., K.C., & B.C., 215 M 72, 695 P2d 816 (1985).

Grant of Long-Term Custody Proper — Finding of Abuse and Neglect: Upon motion by the state to terminate parental rights, the District Court ordered that the "parental custodial rights of [mother, father, and stepfather] in and to the youths [B.N. and T.N.], and to their property, are hereby terminated". Under the authority of 41-3-406 (renumbered 41-3-438), the court then awarded permanent legal custody to the Department of Family Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) and gave the Department the right to place the children in foster care. The court also awarded supervised visitation rights to the parents and grandparents—an award inconsistent with termination of parental rights. The record clearly showed that neither the state nor the court intended to fully sever parental rights, even though the order used the words "terminated" and "permanent custody". On appeal, the Supreme Court found that the District Court intended to grant the state long-term custody, substantiated by a 10-year history of family turmoil resulting in abuse and neglect of the children, and that placement of the children in foster care was appropriate. In re B.N. & T.N., 245 M 511, 802 P2d 1244, 47 St. Rep. 2225 (1990).

Standard of Review — Custody Determinations and Termination of Parental Rights: The same standard of review applies to both termination of parental rights and custody determinations. As set out in In re R.A.D., 231 M 143, 753 P2d 862, 45 St. Rep. 496 (1988), in both instances the District Court's decision is afforded all reasonable presumptions as to the correctness of the determination, and therefore the decision will not be disturbed on appeal unless there is a mistake of law or a finding of fact not supported by substantial evidence that would amount to a clear abuse of discretion. In re S.P., 241 M 190, 786 P2d 642, 47 St. Rep. 190 (1990).

Award of Long-Term Custody Not Considered Termination of Parental Rights: An award of long-term custody under 41-3-406 (renumbered 41-3-438) is not equivalent to a termination of parental rights requiring that the statutory factors of 41-3-609 be met. In re R.T.L.P., 238 M 384, 777 P2d 892, 46 St. Rep. 1354 (1989), followed in In re T.A., 249 M 186, 814 P2d 994, 48 St. Rep. 634 (1991).

Insufficient Evidence to Award Child Support: In a dispositional hearing held by the Youth Court under 41-3-406 (renumbered 41-3-438) in which the court removed the child from her abusive mother's care and placed her in the care of her natural father, the court erroneously ordered the mother to pay child support to the father because there was insufficient evidence to support a finding of child support. The court failed to consider the factors in 40-4-204 and the Carlson formula, except to note that the father had just started a new business and the mother was employed as a receptionist. In re C.C., 237 M 246, 772 P2d 857, 46 St. Rep. 773 (1989).

Youth Court Jurisdiction Concurrent With District Court: The Youth Court has concurrent jurisdiction with the District Court over all youths who are within the state for any purpose. Upon the petition for temporary custody filed by the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services), the Youth Court had the authority to determine that the child in question was a youth in need of care, to remove her from her mother's abusive home, and, following a dispositional hearing, to place her in the custody of her natural father. In re C.C., 237 M 246, 772 P2d 857, 46 St. Rep. 773 (1989).

Grant of Long-Term Departmental Custody: Under 41-3-406 (renumbered 41-3-438), once a youth is found to be abused, neglected, or dependent, custody of the youth can be transferred to the state. Upon such finding, the District Court properly granted custody to the state until the children reach 18 years of age or until further notice of the court. In re A.H., T.H., & J.A.H., 236 M 323, 769 P2d 1245, 46 St. Rep. 395 (1989), followed in In re F.H., J.K., & B.K., 266 M 36, 878 P2d 890, 51 St. Rep. 649 (1994).

Adjudicatory and Dispositional Hearing Combined — Notice Not Required: Parental rights may be terminated at a dispositional hearing under 41-3-406 (renumbered 41-3-438) and 41-3-607. The dispositional hearing was combined with an adjudicatory hearing under 41-3-404 (renumbered 41-3-437), and no specific notice of the combination was required. Custody of R.A.D., 44 St. Rep. 2018 (1987). Opinion withdrawn but issue affirmed in Custody of R.A.D. & J.D., 231 M 143, 753 P2d 862, 45 St. Rep. 496 (1988).

Only Show Cause Hearing Required Upon Filing Petition for Temporary Investigative Authority (See 2001 Amendment to 41-3-427): A mother contended that an order granting temporary custody to the state and allowing temporary investigative authority (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427) under 41-3-406 (renumbered 41-3-438) should be vacated for lack of an adjudicatory hearing pursuant to 41-3-404 (renumbered 41-3-437) and a dispositional hearing pursuant to 41-3-406 (renumbered 41-3-438). In denying the motion to vacate, the District Court properly held that a show cause hearing is the only hearing required when a petition for temporary investigative authority (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427) is filed. In re J.W. & J.C., 226 M 491, 736 P2d 960, 44 St. Rep. 843 (1987).

Refusal to Relinquish Custody of Indian Children to Tribe — No Abuse of Discretion: Although a tribe participated in the dispositional hearing and presented a formal resolution asking for custody of the children, who were tribal members, the District Court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to relinquish custody to the tribe when it was determined that the children's best interests would be better served by leaving them in their foster home placement, with the ultimate goal of placing them in a Native American home. In re M.J.D., C.K.D., & A.R.D., 225 M 200, 731 P2d 937, 44 St. Rep. 167 (1987).

Parent Not to Unilaterally Declare Emancipation of Child — Terminate Support: Husband petitioned District Court to excuse support arrearages on grounds minor child was emancipated. The Supreme Court reversed the lower court's finding that petitioner's child support obligation was terminated. The court noted that the obligated parent may not unilaterally declare the child emancipated and terminate support. The question of whether a child is emancipated is a question of fact to be determined by the court. If emancipation can be established, a parent generally has no further duty to support the child. Prior to the age of 18, however, there is a presumption against the emancipation of a child, and the burden of establishing emancipation is on the party asserting it. The child in this case was adjudicated a youth in need of care. Parents have a continuing duty of support for a youth in need of care which runs contrary to the concept of emancipation. A decree may be modified to terminate support because of the emancipation of a child only as to installments accruing after the motion. In re Marriage of Bordner, 220 M 339, 715 P2d 436, 43 St. Rep. 417 (1986).

Dispositional Order to Follow Hearing: It was reversible error for the District Court to indicate its intention to transfer custody from the parents to the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) before the dispositional hearing was completed. In re M.L.H., H.M.H., & R.H., 220 M 288, 715 P2d 32, 43 St. Rep. 375 (1986).

"Ability to Work" — Support Order for Foster Care Reversed: In determining the parents' obligation for support, District Court erred by including, as income, the wife's "ability to work" as this is a speculative condition. The amount of support should not be based on speculative conditions. When the only relevant evidence was a statement on the parents' financial statement that "[A.R.'s] income is our only income since [W.R.] is not working", the record did not contain sufficient evidence to support the District Court's conclusion. In re L.R., 218 M 266, 707 P2d 24, 42 St. Rep. 1570 (1985).

Findings Required to Terminate Parental Rights: A court must make findings in accordance with 41-3-406 (renumbered 41-3-438), 41-3-607, and 41-3-609 before it can terminate parental rights and award permanent custody of any child to the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services). In re C.A.R. & P.J.R., 214 M 174, 693 P2d 1214, 41 St. Rep. 2395 (1984).

Failure to Object to Lack of Report at Trial Court — Effect of Report: Because, at the trial court level, the mother failed to object to the failure to prepare and submit a financial report, she was precluded from raising the issue on appeal. Even if an objection had been made in a timely fashion, failure to make the report does not affect the underlying proceeding; its only purpose is to determine the parent's financial ability to contribute to costs. In this instance, because the parent has not been asked to so contribute, the failure to prepare a report would have no effect. In re B.L.O., 213 M 164, 689 P2d 1246, 41 St. Rep. 2024 (1984).

Cross-Examination on "Best Interests" Proper: The state began termination of parental rights proceedings in the District Court. The court consolidated the adjudicatory and dispositional hearings, found the youths to be "in need of care", found that the parents had not complied with the approved treatment plan, found them to be beyond rehabilitation, and terminated their parental rights. On appeal, the parents contended the trial court committed reversible error by not allowing the parents to cross-examine the testifying physician regarding the "best interests" of the children. The Supreme Court held that a trial court must hear evidence regarding the "best interest" of the children during the dispositional hearing. Because the trial court consolidated that hearing with the adjudicatory hearing, there was only one hearing, and it was error to exclude the evidence. The court held that it was not prejudicial error, however, in light of the substantial evidence presented that the youths were in need of care and the parents were beyond rehabilitation. In re C.L.A. & J.A., 211 M 393, 685 P2d 931, 41 St. Rep. 1444 (1984).

Voluntary Relinquishment of Custody — Intervening Divorce — Custody to Father: The District Court did not abuse its discretion in awarding custody of a child to his father after the parents, while still married, surrendered temporary custody to the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) because of the actions of the mother. Subsequent to the surrender of the child but prior to the award of custody, the couple were divorced. The District Court was correct in continuing with the abuse and neglect custody proceeding rather than dismissing it and allowing custody to be determined in the couple's divorce action. Once a determination of abuse and neglect has been made, the court proceeds to a dispositional hearing to determine the custody of the child. There was substantial evidence that the father was stable and nonabusive and the mother had potential for further abuse. In re M.M., 200 M 244, 650 P2d 784, 39 St. Rep. 1716 (1982).

Family Unity Not to Be Preserved at Expense of Children's Best Interests: After an adjudicatory hearing, the District Court terminated the parental rights of the parents of five children and granted custody with authority to consent to adoption to the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services). Under Department placement, the children would be separated from each other. The paternal grandmother appealed to the Supreme Court, claiming that the state policy of preserving the unity and welfare of the family as set forth in 41-3-101 was violated by the separation of the children and by the District Court's refusal to award the children to her. The Supreme Court affirmed because the District Court's findings indicated that it had considered the grandmother's request but that the overriding concern was and ought to have been the best interests of the children. In re M.N., 199 M 407, 649 P2d 749, 39 St. Rep. 1487 (1982), followed in In re S.P., 241 M 190, 786 P2d 642, 47 St. Rep. 190 (1990). See also In re E.A.T. & T.A.T., 1999 MT 281, 296 M 535, 989 P2d 860, 56 St. Rep. 1133 (1999).

Severance of Parental Rights — Counsel Not Absolutely Required at In-Chambers Interview of Children: In the trial court, a mother's parental rights to her two children were terminated and custody granted to the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services). On appeal, the issue was whether the court had erred by interviewing the children in chambers without the presence of the mother and counsel. When the trial court announced to counsel and the mother that it wished to interview both children in chambers, neither counsel nor the mother objected. The mother claimed that the interview of the children without the presence of her counsel violated her rights to due process. She relied on a case in which it was stated that a child may testify out of the parents' presence in abuse and neglect cases subject to the cross-examination by the parents' attorney. The reviewing court noted that nothing in that opinion suggested that it was the duty of the trial judge to assert a parent's right to cross-examination if counsel for the parent does not. Here, in any event, there was no testimony in chambers, just an inquiry into the children's desires regarding custody. A record of the interviews was made and any claimed right of cross-examination was waived by failing to assert that right at the trial level. In re A.C.S. & E.S.S., 190 M 180, 619 P2d 1199, 37 St. Rep. 1868 (1980).

Home Study of Father's Parents — Discretion of Court: In a proceeding involving the termination of a father's parental rights, in which it was conceded that he could not parent the infant, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to order a home study of the father's parents when the facts indicated that the best interests of the child would not be served by granting custody to the grandparents. In re T.J.D., J.L.D. & R.J.W., 189 M 147, 615 P2d 212 (1980).

Declaration of Child as Youth in Need of Care — Custody Awarded to Agency — Evidence of Abuse or Neglect: A child diagnosed as failing to thrive was given to foster parents. Professional personnel all agreed that the child in question was failing to thrive and that the child's condition deteriorated while in the care of the natural mother. The child's condition improved dramatically while in foster care. The District Court's finding and conclusion that the child was a neglected child was supported by "clear and convincing" evidence, and the court was justified in permanently depriving the natural mother of the child and transferring legal custody to SRS (now Department of Public Health and Human Services). In re M.R.L., 186 M 468, 608 P2d 134 (1980).

Order Based on Potential of Future Abuse: Because there was evidence showing a high potential for future physical abuse by appellant of her own child, the court did not abuse its discretion in ordering that the child be taken from its mother and the mother's parental rights terminated. In re M.A.M., 183 M 434, 600 P2d 203 (1979).

Evidence Supporting Finding of Neglect: In a child custody case, two circumstances were found by the Supreme Court to be particularly supportive of the District Court finding that the father had neglected his minor child: (1) the father failed to notify the juvenile authorities, despite information about abuse of the child while in her mother's custody and despite the urging by an attorney he had consulted; and (2) the maternal grandmother, not the father, had taken care of the child when the mother forced the child out of the apartment. Additionally, no "viable parent-child relationship" was found to have existed between father and child. Wenz v. Schwartze, 183 M 166, 598 P2d 1086 (1979).

Failure to Make Required Findings: The District Court abused its discretion in awarding permanent custody to the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) because it patently failed to make the required findings that the child was "abused, dependent, or neglected" and therefore was without power to effect a permanent transfer of custody to a nonparent. In re Fish, 174 M 201, 569 P2d 924 (1977).

Youth in Need of Care — Transfer of Custody: It was clear from the record that appellant was unwilling or unable to provide care necessary for the physical and emotional well-being of her children, and testimony supported the court's finding that the children were abused and neglected youths in need of care within the meaning of 41-3-102 and its judgment transferring permanent legal custody of the children to the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) pursuant to 41-3-406 (renumbered 41-3-438). In re Moyer, 173 M 208, 567 P2d 47 (1977).

Abandonment: Mother leaving infant with babysitter for 1 night and not returning for approximately 1 month supports a finding of abandonment and a dependency upon the public for support where 2 days after mother's departure welfare department was awarded temporary custody. In re Henderson, 168 M 329, 542 P2d 1204 (1975).

Child's Best Interest: Substantial credible evidence that father maltreated children and was incompetent coupled with evidence mother did not provide proper or sufficient food, clothing, or sanitary or medical care was sufficient to support finding and judgment that children were dependent and neglected, awarding permanent care, custody, and control to proper state agency, with right to consent to children's adoption. In re Jones & Peterson Children, 168 M 1, 539 P2d 1193 (1975).

Child's Interests Outweigh Parent's: Once a child has been found dependent and neglected, the primary concern is for the child's best interests and welfare, not that of the mother, and the fact that the mother's consent may have been obtained by undue influence does not necessarily invalidate a judgment awarding permanent custody to the welfare department with the power to consent to adoption. In re Bad Yellow Hair, 162 M 107, 509 P2d 9 (1973).

Custody to State Not Abuse of Discretion: Four children, the two oldest of which were of early school age, were insecure, troubled, frightened, and suffered from lack of medical care. Their mother had been abandoned by her husband, had an alcoholic problem, misused welfare funds, and failed to properly provide within the funds allocated. The decision of the District Court to declare the children dependent and neglected within section 10-501, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed), and to award custody to the State Welfare Department (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) with right of adoption was not an abuse of discretion. In re Corneliusen, 159 M 6, 494 P2d 908 (1972).

Impoverishment Not a Shield for Neglect: The fact that a family is impoverished does not mean that the mother can use such impoverishment as a shield to hide behind in the neglect of her children when her very acts deprived the children of attention and care. Misuse of welfare funds, lack of medical care, and failure to properly provide within the funds allocated clearly reveal neglect of her children. In re Corneliusen, 159 M 6, 494 P2d 908 (1972).

Sufficiency of Evidence: Evidence in an action by the Director of the Division of Child Welfare (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) to obtain permanent custody of four minor children as dependent and neglected under section 10-501, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed), was sufficient to support the trial court's finding that two minor daughters were dependent and neglected. The evidence showed that the multitude of the father's problems was such as to make his temper erratic and to cause profanity not conducive to correctly guiding young, impressionable girls toward an adult life. The trial court properly awarded custody of the two minor daughters to the Division of Child Welfare (now Department of Public Health and Human Services). In re Sheriff, 147 M 259, 410 P2d 940 (1966).

Ability to Support Child: Since ability of parents to support children was not determined in compliance with sections 10-506 and 10-507, R.C.M. 1947 (since repealed), but was left to testimony to be elicited at a later hearing, order compelling parents to pay support costs in action depriving them of the children was set aside. In re Phelps, 145 M 557, 402 P2d 593 (1965).

Effect of Awarding Custody to State: Where a child is found by a court decree to be dependent and neglected and its care and custody are awarded to a state agency, the child is as free from parental supervision as when placed in the custody of adoptive parents. State ex rel. Frederick v. District Court, 119 M 143, 173 P2d 626 (1946).

Case Notes

Mother's Objection to Termination of Parental Rights Not "Dispute Among the Parties" if Not Timely: At the start of the permanent custody hearing, the mother moved to continue the hearing so that a home study could be conducted on the woman whom the mother was recommending take care of her child until she was released from prison. The District Court proceeded with the hearing and ultimately terminated the parental rights of both parents. The mother argued that the District Court should have continued the hearing because the statute authorized the Department of Public Health and Human Services to place the child only "in the absence of a dispute between the parties". The Supreme Court held that at the time that the hearing for temporary custody was held, the mother had not come forward and that therefore the District Court at the permanent custody and termination hearing could proceed to make a determination regarding permanent custody of the child as though there was no dispute between the parties. Case Notes

Sufficient Findings to Warrant Grant of Temporary Legal Custody: A mother appealed an order granting temporary legal custody of her child to the state. The Supreme Court held that an order of temporary legal custody is normally an interlocutory order subject to review pursuant to a writ of supervisory control, rather than by direct appeal. Nevertheless, in this case, the court decided to address the appeal as if it were a direct appeal because the state's motion to dismiss had been denied earlier. The court found sufficient evidence to support the order of temporary custody. Even though the mother did nothing wrong personally, she made mistakes concerning other people in her life that endangered her child's welfare. A finding that a parent personally caused a child's injuries is not necessary for a grant of temporary legal custody. A District Court may consider a child to be a youth in need of care regardless of the parent's care for the child or even whether actual abuse or neglect occurred. The temporary custody order was affirmed. In re D.A., 2003 MT 109, 315 M 340, 68 P3d 735 (2003).

Temporary Custody Order Not Considered Final for Purposes of Appeal — Writ of Supervisory Control Appropriate Mechanism to Challenge Temporary Custody: The District Court ordered temporary legal custody for a child, and the child's mother appealed. The Supreme Court held that orders of temporary legal custody do not embrace a final determination of the rights of the parties contemplated in former Rule 1, M.R.App.P. (now superseded), that would subject the temporary order to direct appeal. Rather, temporary custody orders are considered interlocutory orders from which the Supreme Court will grant relief in extraordinary circumstances. This ensures the expeditious review of legal errors while still protecting children from the instability of protracted, piecemeal litigation. However, qualifying temporary custody orders as interlocutory does not leave a parent who is aggrieved by an erroneous order without a remedy. The parent may invoke the extraordinary remedy of a writ of supervisory control, which is the appropriate mechanism to challenge an order of temporary custody. Case Notes

District Court Not Limited to Consideration of Only Physical Neglect in Termination of Parental Rights: The final petition for termination of a mother's parental rights specifically cited physical neglect as its basis, and the mother contended that the District Court was thus barred from considering any evidence beyond physical neglect, such as psychological abuse, as demonstrated by the living conditions in her home. The District Court did not rule on the issue, but simply made the underlying findings necessary to terminate the mother's parental rights. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Although it may have been better if the final petition had listed other grounds, it is proper for the state to consider other causes of abuse and neglect during proceedings because the purpose of the proceedings is to protect the child. The final petition also cited failure to comply with the treatment plan as another basis for termination. The treatment plan addressed the mother's psychological issues related to her parenting skills, so the mother was clearly on notice that psychological issues could be considered. Based on the record, parental rights were properly terminated because the mother failed to comply with the treatment plan, she was unable to properly and consistently parent her children by understanding and meeting each of their needs, her conduct was unlikely to change within a reasonable time relevant to the developmental needs of the children, and termination was in the best interests of the children. In re J.G., C.G., & M.G.-E., 2004 MT 104, 321 M 54, 89 P3d 11 (2004).

Failure to Adjudicate Youth in Need of Care Precluding Termination of Parental Rights: A parent contended that parental rights were improperly terminated because the child was not properly adjudicated as a youth in need of care. The Supreme Court noted that such adjudication is a threshold requirement before a court may grant temporary legal custody, order a parental treatment plan, or terminate parental rights. The state argued that the child was found to be a youth in need of care during earlier guardianship proceedings in a different District Court. The Supreme Court cited In re F.M., 2002 MT 180, 311 M 35, 53 P3d 368 (2002), for the holding that evidence received at a hearing on a collateral matter, such as a guardianship proceeding, did not satisfy the adjudicatory requirements of 41-3-404 (renumbered 41-3-437). Further, it was improper for the District Court to approve a treatment plan 10 months prior to proper adjudication of the child as a youth in need of care, in violation of 41-3-406 (renumbered 41-3-438) and this section (formerly numbered 41-3-420), which also rendered the requirements of 41-3-609 unsatisfied. Because the child was not properly adjudicated a youth in need of care, court approval of a treatment plan was improper and termination of parental rights was reversed. In re B.N.Y., 2003 MT 241, 317 M 291, 77 P3d 189 (2003).

Failure to Comply With Treatment Plan Requirement for Provision of Stable Home With Adequate Housing and Income — Parental Rights Properly Terminated: A mother relinquished custody of her three children after the District Court determined that the children were in need of care. When she became pregnant again, the state moved for emergency protective services for the fourth child upon its birth. When the state moved to terminate the father's parental rights based on failure to comply with two treatment plans, the father contended that because the child was removed from the parents at birth, it was never abused or neglected and thus could not properly have been adjudicated as a youth in need of care. Because this section requires that an adequate treatment plan must identify the problems or conditions that resulted in abuse or neglect, the father asserted that the treatment plans were not adequate because the child was not abused or neglected. The Supreme Court disagreed. Because the mother as primary caregiver could not provide for the children, the onus was on the father to provide a safe environment for the new child. Both treatment plans required that the father provide a stable home for the child with adequate housing and income, but the father could provide no evidence of substantial compliance with either plan, being unable to secure either a residence or a job. Thus, the District Court did not err in determining that both elements of 41-3-609 were present and in terminating the father's parental rights. In re K.C.H., 2003 MT 125, 316 M 13, 68 P3d 788 (2003).

No Requirement That Parent's Counsel Receive and Approve Treatment Plan Prior to Submission to Court: Under 41-3-609, a District Court may approve a treatment plan without a parent's signature, and under former 41-3-420 (now 41-3-443), a treatment plan must include the parent's signature, unless the plan is ordered by the District Court. Thus, there is no requirement for parental approval prior to submitting a treatment plan to the District Court, and by implication, there is no requirement that a parent's counsel receive and approve a proposed treatment plan prior to submission to the court. In re R.F., 2001 MT 199, 306 M 270, 32 P3d 1257 (2001).

Case Notes

Dismissal of Parenting Action Following Placement of Children Under Permanency Plan — Appeal Moot: While a parenting action was pending in Flathead County, a District Court in Missoula County approved a permanency plan that placed the children in California with the mother. The father did not appeal the placement order. The Flathead County action was subsequently dismissed, and the father appealed. The Supreme Court held that the Flathead County order was moot because the state no longer possessed authority over the custody and placement of the children, and in the absence of an ongoing, concrete controversy, effective relief could not be granted. The appeal was dismissed. In re J.A.S. & E.R.S., 2008 MT 269, 345 M 189, 190 P3d 299 (2008).

Failure to Complete Treatment Plan and Lack of Evidence That Conduct Likely to Change in Reasonable Time — Children in Foster Care for 17 of 22 Months — Parental Rights Properly Terminated: When D.A. was born in 2003, he and both parents tested positive for methamphetamine, and the state immediately obtained temporary custody of D.A. The case was dismissed 10 months later. When M.A. was born in 2005, the mother again tested positive for methamphetamine, and the state removed both children and placed them in foster care. The parents completed treatment plans and the children were returned to their care. About 2 months later, the parents were arrested on drug-related charges and the children were again removed, placed in foster care, and adjudicated youths in need of care. The parents agreed to another treatment plan, which included addressing and conquering their drug addictions and maintaining visitation with their children, increasing visitation when appropriate, and increasing parenting responsibilities until they were reunited with their children. However, the parents never completed the treatment plan, and their visitation actually decreased because of the children's negative reactions to the visits. Rather than adopt the state's proposed permanency plan calling for reunification, the District Court ordered the state to take steps to permanently place the children. Subsequently, after the children had been in foster care for 17 of the previous 22 months, the state moved to terminate the parents' rights. At the hearing, witnesses testified that it would take another year to know if reunification would be possible. In the interests of the children, the District Court terminated the parents' rights. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. The District Court correctly held that the parents had not completed their treatment plan and that as a matter of fact the conditions rendering the parents unfit were unlikely to change in a reasonable time, based on their past drug use and the effect their use had on their ability to care for their children. Nor was it error for the court to consider the presumption that, because the children had been in foster care for 17 months, termination of parental rights was in the children's best interests. Additionally, there was sufficient evidence for the court to conclude that the state's permanency plan was not in the children's best interests, and having rejected the plan, the court had the authority to order the state to take specific steps to effectuate an alternate plan, which could include adoption of the children. Entering the order following the permanency hearing to advance the children's best interests did not constitute plain error or violate the parents' due process rights, and termination of parental rights was not plain error or an abuse of discretion. In re Custody & Parental Rights of D.A. & M.A., 2008 MT 247, 344 M 513, 189 P3d 631 (2008).

Parents' Due Process Rights Not Violated by Failure to Hold Permanency Plan Hearing When Objective of Plan Achieved: Three times the state attempted to preserve and reunite the parents with their children through the establishment of treatment plans and by emphasizing to the parents the importance of permanent placement of the children in a safe and secure home, but each time the parents failed to comply with the treatment plans and the children were returned to state custody. The District Court, without holding a permanency plan hearing, eventually terminated the parents' rights. On appeal, the parents claimed that their due process rights were violated by the failure of the court to hold a permanency plan hearing. The Supreme Court disagreed. Although a permanency plan hearing per se was never held, the purposes served by a hearing were nevertheless met. The District Court had repeatedly referenced permanency for the children and sought to ensure that the parents understood that the children could not be allowed to languish in the system. This is typical of the discussion that would normally occur at a permanency plan hearing, and had a hearing been held, it would undoubtedly have formalized the state's goal of reunifying the parents and children, which had been attempted repeatedly. Thus, failure to hold a permanency plan hearing was not fundamentally unfair and did not violate the parents' due process rights. In re B.B. & J.B., 2006 MT 66, 331 M 407, 133 P3d 215 (2006), following In re A.R., 2004 MT 22, 319 M 340, 83 P3d 1287 (2004).

Res Judicata and Collateral Estoppel — Inapplicable Absent Final Judgment: In In re B.N.Y., 2003 MT 241, 317 M 291, 77 P3d 189 (2003), the Supreme Court held that a mother's due process rights were violated in parental rights termination proceedings. Almost immediately after the 2003 decision, the state began new proceedings. The mother asserted that res judicata and collateral estoppel barred the new action. The District Court disagreed, and the mother appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Both res judicata and collateral estoppel require a final judgment in an initial action before they preclude a similar future action. The initial order terminating the mother's parental rights did not constitute a final judgment as a result of In re B.N.Y. The 2003 decision had no preclusive effect in the current action, and the mother's res judicata and collateral estoppel arguments failed. In re B.N.Y., 2006 MT 34, 331 M 145, 130 P3d 594 (2006). See also Baltrusch v. Baltrusch, 2006 MT 51, 331 M 281, 130 P3d 1267 (2006).

No Due Process Violations in Parental Rights Termination Proceeding — Statutory Mandates Addressed: A mother asserted that her due process rights were violated in a parental rights termination proceeding because: (1) the state failed to make reasonable efforts to reunify mother and child as required in 41-3-423; (2) the District Court, in effect, terminated her right while purporting only to grant a planned permanent living arrangement and permanent care and control of the child to the state in violation of 41-3-609; (3) the state failed to petition the District Court for termination in a timely fashion in violation of 41-3-604; and (4) the District Court failed to hold a permanency plan hearing in a timely manner in violation of this section. The Supreme Court considered each claim and affirmed. Although reunification efforts failed, the state's efforts were reasonable and in compliance with the governing statutes. The mother's parental rights were severely limited, but not actually terminated, so her argument regarding improper termination procedures failed. The state does not have to petition to terminate parental rights if a compelling reason has been documented for determining that filing a petition would not be in the child's best interests. In this case, there was such a compelling reason—namely, that the state had tried to reunify mother and child for years and did not seek termination casually. The tardy permanency hearing argument also failed in light of the state's diligent, although unsuccessful, efforts to create a permanent and stable environment for the child in an effort to ensure that the child did not languish in foster care. In re B.N.Y., 2006 MT 34, 331 M 145, 130 P3d 594 (2006). See also In re R.T.L.P., 238 M 384, 777 P2d 892 (1989), and In re A.R., 2004 MT 22, 319 M 340, 83 P3d 1287 (2004).

Failure to Hold Parental Permanency Plan Hearing Within Statutory Time Not Violative of Due Process: A mother whose parental rights were terminated contended that the failure to hold a permanency hearing within the time enumerated in this section, the length of the proceeding, and the denial of her request to allow her counselor to videotape her visits with her children violated her due process rights. The Supreme Court examined the case for fundamental fairness and affirmed. Under this section, a permanency hearing is not required if a child has been returned to a biological parent, and in this case, the children were returned to the custody of their biological father. The court did not condone the failure to hold a timely hearing as required, but noted that in this case, there was an ongoing attempt to reunify the children with one of the parents, which was the goal of the permanency plan, so the goal was accomplished without a hearing. As to the issue of length of proceedings, the court noted that despite the failure of the mother to show progress toward reunification goals, after 15 months, the Department was still actively working with her to accomplish the goal and did not seek termination until more than 20 months after the children were removed from the home, so the length of time did not prejudice the mother's rights. Moreover, the request for presence of the mother's counselor during visits was never actually denied by the District Court because the mother had no visitation rights at the time of the request that could have been denied. In re A.R. & S.A.R., 2004 MT 22, 319 M 340, 83 P3d 1287 (2004).

No Denial of Fair Procedures in Grant of Long-Term Custody of Child to State — Failure of Parent to Properly Object to Procedures at Hearing: Long-term custody of a child was granted to the state. The father appealed on grounds that he was denied fundamentally fair procedures in the custody proceedings, contending that: (1) the District Court failed to hold a permanency hearing within the statutory deadline; (2) the state failed to submit the statutorily required prehearing report to the District Court; (3) the state failed to develop a plan with any elements of permanency; (4) the state tried to terminate his visitation rights without satisfying the requisite statutory criteria and burden of proof; and (5) the District Court erroneously granted the state a second chance to prove its case. The Supreme Court considered each claim in turn, and affirmed. Although the permanency hearing occurred after the statutory deadline in this section (formerly numbered 41-3-412), the father did not raise the issue in District Court or advise the District Court of the appropriate remedy as required, and raising the issue in a proposed conclusion of law did not constitute a proper objection. The father also neglected to object to the absence of a prehearing report either at the hearing or by pretrial motion, so those issues were not properly preserved for appeal. The contention that the state failed to develop a plan with any elements of permanency was belied by evidence showing that the child had made reasonable progress toward a settled placement. The question of whether there was any merit to the state's attempt to terminate visitation was moot because the District Court reinstated visitation at the permanency hearing. Moreover, disallowing the state a second opportunity to present its case would have required that the District Court overlook the best interests of the child by ignoring substantial evidence that the child continued to suffer both emotionally and mentally. It was the father who objected to the form of the evidence as first offered, and because the evidence was originally offered in a form authorized by statute, the child's best interests were paramount, and the father could not demonstrate prejudice in the District Court's granting of another hearing to hear the evidence. In re M.W. & L.W., 2002 MT 126, 310 M 103, 49 P3d 31 (2002).

Findings Sufficient to Warrant Assignment to Long-Term Custody: The state petitioned to terminate the mother's parental rights or, alternatively, to grant long-term custody to the state with the right to assign guardianship to the children's grandmother. The District Court granted the latter. The mother did not contend that the court's findings were erroneous, but did argue that the court erred because its findings were not sufficiently specific to justify long-term custody to the state. The Supreme Court disagreed, noting that if the state follows fundamentally fair procedures, a parent may be divested of custody. Here, the District Court found that: (1) the children were youths in need of care; (2) the state had developed treatment plans for the mother, but the plans had not been followed; (3) the mother was warned that the last treatment plan was her final chance; (4) the mother had been given many opportunities to straighten out and retain custody of her children, but did not do so; (5) continuation of the parent-child legal relationship would likely result in continued abuse or neglect if the children were returned to the mother; (6) the mother's conduct and condition rendered her unfit, unable, and unwilling to give her children adequate parental care; (7) it would be in the children's best interest if they were allowed to visit with their mother as directed by the state, even if she was not their custodian; (8) since the children had been living with their grandmother, they had improved in school and become more socially involved; and (9) the grandmother was willing to act as the children's guardian. These findings were sufficiently specific to support the District Court's award of long-term custody to the children's grandmother, and that award was affirmed. In re Custody & Parental Rights of T.Z. & J.Z., 2000 MT 205, 300 M 522, 6 P3d 960, 57 St. Rep. 806 (2000).

Petition for Long-Term Custody Included With Petition for Termination of Parental Rights — No Requirement for Filing Subsequent to Hearing: The state petitioned to terminate the mother's parental rights or, alternatively, to grant long-term custody to the state with the right to assign guardianship to the children's grandmother. Because the District Court combined the permanency hearing with the termination hearing, the petition for long-term legal custody was not filed subsequent to the hearing, which the mother contended violated 41-3-412 (renumbered 41-3-445) and erroneously denied her sufficient notice. However, 41-3-412 (renumbered 41-3-445) does not require that a petition for long-term custody be filed subsequent to a hearing. That petition may be filed at the same time as a petition to terminate parental rights, and this alternative petition provides a parent with adequate notice of issues to be raised at the hearing. Thus, the court did not err in awarding long-term custody without requiring a separate petition limited to that issue. In re Custody & Parental Rights of T.Z. & J.Z., 2000 MT 205, 300 M 522, 6 P3d 960, 57 St. Rep. 806 (2000).

Sufficient Evidence That ICWA Standards Met in Terminating Parental Rights — Termination Affirmed Absent Abuse of Discretion: An Indian father contended that the state did not present sufficient evidence under the federal Indian Child Welfare Act of 1978 (ICWA) to warrant termination of his parental rights. The Supreme Court determined that: (1) there was sufficient evidence that continued custody of the children was likely to result in serious emotional or physical damage to the children; (2) the evidence was supported by testimony from qualified experts; (3) active but unsuccessful efforts had been made to provide remedial services and rehabilitative programs to prevent the breakup of the Indian family; and (4) the children had lived in foster care a sufficient time to create the presumption under 41-3-604 that the children's best interests would be served by terminating parental rights. The ICWA requirements having been followed, parental rights were properly terminated. In re S.R., R.R., & G.R. Jr., 2004 MT 227, 322 M 424, 97 P3d 559 (2004).

Federal Indian Child Welfare Act — Temporary Custody Not in Compliance With Act — Otherwise Valid Parental Termination Not Invalidated: Child of Indian parents was placed in the temporary custody of the state in proceedings that may not have complied with the federal Indian Child Welfare Act (25 U.S.C. §1901, et seq.). Later, in proceedings that complied with the Act and before a different judge with different witnesses, the parents' rights were terminated and permanent custody was granted the state. The Supreme Court held that any failure to comply with the Act in the temporary proceedings would not invalidate the later termination because the proceedings are separate actions involving separate petitions and statutory guidelines. Determination of Neglect at Custody Hearing Not Sufficient: After the death of the custodial mother, the maternal grandmother took the children into her home. The natural father petitioned to have the children restored to his custody. The grandmother requested custody and filed a petition for adoption. In a proceeding pursuant to 40-4-221, the grandmother was granted custody because the father had failed to make child support payments for more than a year and had generally neglected the children. The trial court properly dismissed the grandmother's petition for adoption for lack of jurisdiction. The determination of neglect needed to excuse the need for the father's consent to adoption under 40-8-111 (now repealed) must be made in a separate proceeding pursuant to Title 41, ch. 3, part 6. Supreme Court Avoids Ruling on Whether Parental Rights Termination Proceedings Subject to Americans With Disabilities Act: The father in a parental rights termination proceeding argued that because it was found that he was mentally ill, the Department of Public Health and Human Services violated the Americans With Disabilities Act of 1990 by having his parental rights terminated rather than accommodating his mental illness. The Supreme Court avoided ruling on whether parental termination proceedings are subject to the Act, ruling instead that clinical psychologists had testified that the father would not be able to parent within a reasonable time or for the foreseeable future, indicating that there was no way to accommodate the father's mental illness. Abandonment Held to Constitute Abuse or Neglect: The father appealed the termination of his parental rights, arguing that the trial court's finding of abandonment did not constitute a finding of abuse or neglect required by statute to terminate parental rights. The Supreme Court ruled that in the past, it had implicitly upheld terminations on the basis of abandonment and that it was clarifying its earlier rulings by holding that abandonment is "harm to a child's welfare" and that "harm to a child's welfare" is a statutory ground for a finding of "child abuse or neglect" upon which a termination of parental rights may be founded. In re M.J.W., 1998 MT 142, 289 M 232, 961 P2d 105, 55 St. Rep. 563 (1998), followed in In re T.H. & C.D.F., 2005 MT 237, 328 M 428, 121 P3d 541 (2005).

Finding of Abuse, Neglect, or Dependency Necessary Before Consideration of Best Interests of the Child: M.G.M. was born out of wedlock and had little contact with her natural father until the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) placed M.G.M. in a foster home and terminated her mother's parental rights. The Department then sought to terminate the father's parental rights. To terminate his parental rights, the court must first find that the child is abused, neglected, or dependent (see 1995 amendment). Only when such a finding has been made can the court apply the best interests of the child test. In re M.G.M., 201 M 400, 654 P2d 994, 39 St. Rep. 2191 (1982).

Case Notes

Father's Conduct Unlikely to Change Within a Reasonable Time — Reliance on Statutory Presumption Affirmed: In terminating a father's parental rights, the District Court correctly relied on the statutory presumption that the best interests of the children were unlikely to change since both children had been under the care of their grandmother pursuant to a foster care agreement with the Department of Public Health and Human Services for 15 months of the most recent 22 months. The District Court's termination of parental rights was affirmed. In re B.M. and P.M., 2010 MT 114, 356 Mont. 327, 233 P.3d 338.

Sufficient Evidence That Children in Need of Care — Parental Rights Properly Terminated: In 2004, a mother left her two children with a 16-year-old babysitter and did not return for over 24 hours. The children were placed in temporary legal custody with the state, where they remained thereafter. The state attempted to work on reunifying the family, but the mother repeatedly failed to comply with treatment plans, continued her heavy drinking, was arrested several times, and spent periods incarcerated. The children were tribal members, and the state gave proper tribal notification and had an Indian Child Welfare Act expert testify on several occasions that continued parental custody was likely to result in serious emotional or physical harm to the children and that there were no family members available to take the children. The children were adjudicated youth in need of care, and the state eventually sought to terminate the mother's parental rights in 2008. The mother appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. The children had been in foster care for over 4 years, exceeding the threshold for triggering the presumption that termination was in the children's best interests. A reasonable person could conclude, as did the District Court, that the children were in need of care and that the mother's parental rights should be terminated. Substantial evidence showed that the mother: (1) had been charged with four separate criminal offenses and was the subject of a bench warrant; (2) entered an intensive outpatient drug treatment program but stopped after five sessions, indicating a high potential for substance abuse that could only be controlled by incarceration or inpatient treatment; (3) did not complete any parts of the court-approved treatment plan; (4) missed a number of scheduled visits with the children; (5) failed to address her mental health issues; (6) failed to obtain adequate housing; (7) failed to make reunification with the children a priority; and (8) was unlikely to change her pattern of substance abuse and her unstable lifestyle. In re T.W.F & A.R.M., 2009 MT 207, 351 M 233, 210 P3d 174 (2009).

Sufficient Evidence to Terminate Rights of Incarcerated Parent: The District Court did not abuse its discretion in terminating the parental rights of an incarcerated parent after citing: (1) the fact that the child would have been in foster placement for more than 15 of the most recent months before the parent was eligible for parole, thus satisfying the presumption in 43-1-604(1); (2) the parent's criminal history, including seven prior felonies and four sentence revocations; (3) the parent's history of voluntary underemployment, despite the parent's asserted wish to support the child; (4) the parent's failure to establish a substantial relationship with the child through visits or regular contact; (5) the failure of the parent to manifest an ability to assume legal and physical custody because of incarceration; (6) the child's need for immediate permanent placement in order to meet the child's developmental, cognitive, and psychological stability needs; and (7) the inability of the parent to provide for immediate placement because of incarceration. The parent appealed on grounds that the District Court improperly relied on the presumption in 41-3-604(1). The Supreme Court agreed that the presumption was not satisfied because the child had not been in foster care for the requisite amount of time. However, the court noted that parental rights may properly be terminated if the District Court correctly relies on any one basis set out in 41-3-609. In this case, the District Court correctly relied on several bases other than the statutory presumption and thus did not abuse its discretion in terminating the parent's rights. In re M.P., 2008 MT 39, 341 M 333, 177 P3d 495 (2008).

Failure to Apply Proper Statutory Criteria in Termination Proceedings — Reversible Error: Instead of applying the statutory criteria in 41-3-609 when considering whether to terminate a mother's parental rights, the District Court relied on the legal presumption in this section that because the children had been in foster care for 15 of the prior 22 months, termination was appropriate. The Supreme Court reversed. A parent's right to the care and custody of a child is a fundamental liberty interest that must be protected by fundamentally fair procedures. The legal presumption in this section alone is not a sufficient basis to terminate parental rights and neither eliminates the substantive requirements in 41-3-609 nor diminishes the clear and convincing burden of proof on the party seeking to terminate parental rights. By relying on the presumption in this section, the District Court impermissibly shifted the burden of proof to the mother by concluding that there was insufficient evidence to rebut the presumption. It was not the mother's duty to rebut the presumption, but rather the state's burden to show that the mother failed to complete a treatment plan and that the mother's conduct or condition was unlikely to change within a reasonable time. Because the District Court applied the wrong statutory standards, the order terminating parental rights was reversed and the case was remanded for application of the proper statutory criteria. In re D.B. & D.B., 2007 MT 246, 339 M 240, 168 P3d 691 (2007).

Findings Based on More Than Prior Conviction for Crime Against Child — Sufficient Findings to Substantiate Termination of Parental Rights: A father asserted that the District Court lacked sufficient evidence to terminate his parental rights because the court relied on a prior crime committed in Texas that, if committed in Montana, would have been only a misdemeanor. The Supreme Court found that substantial evidence existed to support termination. In addition to the prior sexual crime against a child that was an aggravating circumstance under Montana law, the District Court also found that the father had no significant contact with his children for more than 3 years and failed to complete a treatment plan, that the children had been in foster care for 28 months prior to the termination hearing, and that there was evidence that one of the children claimed that the father sexually abused her. Termination of parental rights was affirmed. In re. M.A.L., D.L., & T.L., 2006 MT 299, 334 M 436, 148 P3d 606 (2006).

Parent's Acquiescence in Adjudicatory Proceedings — Finding That Child Is Youth in Need of Care Based on Parent's Admissions — Stipulation Not Required: A mother contested termination of her parental rights on grounds that her child was not properly adjudicated as a youth in need of care. The mother was incarcerated at the time of the hearing and contended that although she agreed to a treatment plan, she never admitted that the child met the definition of a youth in need of care or stipulated that the child was in need of care. The Supreme Court noted that the trial court should have specifically inquired of the mother or her counsel whether the mother stipulated that the child was a youth in need of care, but it was not error for the District Court to make that finding based on the mother's own admissions that she was addicted to methamphetamine and needed treatment and that her addiction impacted the child unfairly. The mother was not placed at an unfair disadvantage during the termination proceedings and was represented by counsel at all stages. She never questioned the regularity of the proceedings until appeal. The court held that because 35 months had passed between the adjudicatory hearing and the notice of appeal, it would not be in the child's best interests to prolong the matter, particularly when much of the delay was caused by the mother's repeated relapses and her failure to put the child's interests above her desire to indulge her addiction. The adjudication was proper and did not prejudice the mother, and the District Court was affirmed. In re A.S., 2006 MT 281, 334 M 280, 146 P3d 778 (2006).

Parent's Continued Drug Use Unlikely to Change — Parental Rights Properly Terminated: Facts presented at the termination hearing showed that although the mother successfully completed inpatient drug treatment, maintained sobriety for a time, and was moving toward successful completion of her treatment plan, she relapsed and began using methamphetamine again, and the use continued until the termination hearing. Additionally, she had numerous probation violations, the violations were increasing, she failed to maintain employment, and she had no plan for supporting herself or her child. The child had also been in foster care for more than 17 months, but rather than make every effort to maintain her sobriety so that she could parent her child, the mother's relapses continued. The District Court concluded that despite all the available resources, the mother's addiction was stronger than her desire to remain sober and parent her child and that the condition or conduct rendering the mother unfit to parent was unlikely to change within a reasonable time. The mother's parental rights were properly terminated. In re A.S., 2006 MT 281, 334 M 280, 146 P3d 778 (2006).

Termination of Parental Rights of Father Incarcerated for Failure to Pay Child Support Affirmed: A father was incarcerated for failure to pay child support for more than 10 years, resulting in his inability to be available for his child, who had been in foster care for more than 56 consecutive months at the time of hearing. The father's sentence was to run for about 3 additional years. The District Court properly concluded that the child's paramount best interests and needs were best served by continued stable foster care placement and that there was clear and convincing evidence to support termination of the father's parental rights. In re A.N.W., 2006 MT 42, 331 M 208, 130 P3d 619 (2006).

No Due Process Violations in Parental Rights Termination Proceeding — Statutory Mandates Addressed: A mother asserted that her due process rights were violated in a parental rights termination proceeding because: (1) the state failed to make reasonable efforts to reunify mother and child as required in 41-3-423; (2) the District Court, in effect, terminated her right while purporting only to grant a planned permanent living arrangement and permanent care and control of the child to the state in violation of 41-3-609; (3) the state failed to petition the District Court for termination in a timely fashion in violation of this section; and (4) the District Court failed to hold a permanency plan hearing in a timely manner in violation of 41-3-445. The Supreme Court considered each claim and affirmed. Although reunification efforts failed, the state's efforts were reasonable and in compliance with the governing statutes. The mother's parental rights were severely limited, but not actually terminated, so her argument regarding improper termination procedures failed. The state does not have to petition to terminate parental rights if a compelling reason has been documented for determining that filing a petition would not be in the child's best interests. In this case, there was such a compelling reason—namely, that the state had tried to reunify mother and child for years and did not seek termination casually. The tardy permanency hearing argument also failed in light of the state's diligent, although unsuccessful, efforts to create a permanent and stable environment for the child in an effort to ensure that the child did not languish in foster care. In re B.N.Y., 2006 MT 34, 331 M 145, 130 P3d 594 (2006). See also In re R.T.L.P., 238 M 384, 777 P2d 892 (1989), and In re A.R., 2004 MT 22, 319 M 340, 83 P3d 1287 (2004).

Sufficient Evidence That ICWA Standards Met in Terminating Parental Rights — Termination Affirmed Absent Abuse of Discretion: An Indian father contended that the state did not present sufficient evidence under the federal Indian Child Welfare Act of 1978 (ICWA) to warrant termination of his parental rights. The Supreme Court determined that: (1) there was sufficient evidence that continued custody of the children was likely to result in serious emotional or physical damage to the children; (2) the evidence was supported by testimony from qualified experts; (3) active but unsuccessful efforts had been made to provide remedial services and rehabilitative programs to prevent the breakup of the Indian family; and (4) the children had lived in foster care a sufficient time to create the presumption under this section that the children's best interests would be served by terminating parental rights. The ICWA requirements having been followed, parental rights were properly terminated. In re S.R., R.R., & G.R. Jr., 2004 MT 227, 322 M 424, 97 P3d 559 (2004).

Children in Foster Care for Years Coupled With Failure to Comply With Treatment Plan — Parental Rights Properly Terminated: At least three experts testified that the mother failed to comply with a treatment plan. This fact, coupled with the fact that the children were adjudicated youths in need of care and had been in foster care for more than 15 of the most recent 22 months, was sufficient to terminate the mother's parental rights. In re K.S., D.S., & C.S., 2003 MT 212, 317 M 88, 75 P3d 325 (2003).

Recognition of Statutory Presumption Coupled With Parental Rights Termination Criteria — Parental Rights Properly Terminated: A mother contended that the District Court erred in terminating her parental rights by inappropriately relying on the statutory presumption in this section, contrary to the termination criteria in 41-3-609. The children had been in foster care for more than 15 of the most recent 22 months, so the presumption in this section applied, but the presumption neither eliminates the substantive requirements of 41-3-609 nor diminishes the clear and convincing burden of proof on the party seeking to terminate parental rights. However, in this case, the District Court both acknowledged the statutory presumption and considered the termination criteria, which included evidence that the mother had not successfully completed her treatment program and had two significantly handicapping conditions (marginal general aptitude and a personality disorder) that rendered her unfit to parent and that would not change within the foreseeable future. Thus, the mother's parental rights were properly terminated. In re B.H. & D.H., 2001 MT 288, 307 M 412, 37 P3d 736 (2001).

Child in Foster Care for Nineteen Continuous Months — Termination of Parental Rights Presumed to Be in Child's Best Interests: If a child has been in foster care for 15 of the most recent 22 months, the best interests of the child are presumed to be served by the termination of parental rights, pursuant to this section. Here, after the children were placed with their foster parents, they lived in the foster home for 19 continuous months as of the hearing to terminate parental rights. The District Court did not err in applying the presumption in this section in terminating parental rights. In re E.K., C.K., & J.E., 2001 MT 279, 307 M 328, 37 P3d 690 (2001).

Case Notes

Statute Providing No Right to Jury Trial in Parental Rights Termination Cases Not Unconstitutional: The father argued that the language in this section providing that there is no right to a jury trial in a proceeding to terminate parental rights violates the guarantee of a jury trial contained in Montana's Constitution. The Supreme Court, citing previous cases and decisions of other jurisdictions, held that the right to a jury trial exists only if that right existed at the time that the 1889 Montana Constitution was adopted and noted that parental termination proceedings did not exist at that time. The Supreme Court also noted that in 1972, the delegates to the constitutional convention considered whether the right to jury trials should be extended to all cases but did not expand the right to a jury trial. In re M.H. & G.H., 2006 MT 208, 333 M 286, 143 P3d 103 (2006).

Probate Code Permanent Guardianship Proceeding — Dependency or Neglect Not Grounds for Terminating Mother's Custody of Child: A mother's parental rights were not terminated by circumstance when a court order granted, with her consent, temporary guardianship in the paternal grandparents. A later court, on the grandparents' petition for permanent guardianship under the Uniform Probate Code, found that the child was neglected or dependent and that the child's best interests would be served by granting the petition. The mother appeared in and contested the later action, withdrew her consent, and filed a petition to terminate the temporary guardianship. The guardianship provisions of the Uniform Probate Code were never intended as a substitute for the child custody provisions of Title 40 governing dissolution of marriage or for the procedures of this title governing termination of the parent-child relationship. The court relied on cases stating that a dependent neglected best interests of the child determination could not be made in a Uniform Probate Code permanent guardianship proceeding and had to be made under a child custody or parental termination proceeding. In re Guardianship of D.T.N., 275 M 480, 914 P2d 579, 53 St. Rep. 253 (1996).

Failure to Notify Guardian Ad Litem of Adoption Proceedings — Reversible Error: A guardian ad litem is required to represent a child in every case in which child abuse or neglect is alleged, and that representation continues until the child is permanently placed. Therefore, failure by the court to notify an unplaced child's guardian ad litem of a hearing on a petition for permanent adoption constituted reversible error. In re F.H., 272 M 342, 901 P2d 96, 52 St. Rep. 791 (1995).

Award of Permanent Legal Custody — Authority of Court to Award Custody — Best Interests of Child Standard: The Department of Family Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) filed a petition requesting the court to terminate parental rights of Mary Ann

G. and to grant the Department permanent legal custody of J.J.G., with the right to consent to adoption. Former foster parents of J.J.G. filed a petition seeking permanent custody of the child. The court dismissed the foster parents' petition on grounds that the court could only review the placement actions of the Department but could not make the permanent placement itself. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that the lower court erred when it concluded that the foster parents were without legal authority to seek custody of the child and that the lower court had no option other than to grant custody to the Department. The District Court has discretionary authority to transfer legal custody to any qualified individual, including nonrelatives, in order to protect the welfare of the child. In re J.J.G., 266 M 274, 880 P2d 808, 51 St. Rep. 793 (1994), followed in In re E.A.T. & T.A.T., 1999 MT 281, 296 M 535, 989 P2d 860, 56 St. Rep. 1133 (1999).

Error by Court in Failure to Appoint Counsel for Parental Rights Termination Proceedings: To avoid a parent being placed at an unfair disadvantage during parental rights termination proceedings, due process and fairness require that the parent be represented by counsel. An indigent parent is constitutionally guaranteed the right to court-appointed counsel during the proceedings, and denial of such a request constitutes reversible error. (See 2005 amendment.) In re A.S.A., J.L.A., G.A., & A.J.A., 258 M 194, 852 P2d 127, 50 St. Rep. 494 (1993).

Holding of Adjudicatory Hearing as Directory Rather Than Mandatory or Jurisdictional: Because the presiding judge was changed, the dispositional hearing on termination of parental rights was not held within the 180-day period provided in this section. The parent contended that the delay necessitated dismissal of the petition because the timeframe was not met. However, use of the word "shall" with regard to holding the hearing is directory rather than mandatory, and failure to hold the hearing within 180 days does not divest the court of jurisdiction. Absent prejudice to the parent from the hearing delay, termination of parental rights was proper in light of clear and convincing evidence supporting the court's findings and conclusions. In re A.N.S. & L.M.R., 252 M 279, 828 P2d 1357, 49 St. Rep. 250 (1992).

Adjudicatory and Dispositional Hearing Combined — Notice Not Required: Parental rights may be terminated at a dispositional hearing under 41-3-406 (renumbered 41-3-438) and this section. The dispositional hearing was combined with an adjudicatory hearing under 41-3-404 (renumbered 41-3-437), and no specific notice of the combination was required. Custody of R.A.D., 44 St. Rep. 2018 (1987). Opinion withdrawn but issue affirmed in Custody of R.A.D. & J.D., 231 M 143, 753 P2d 862, 45 St. Rep. 496 (1988).

Findings Required to Terminate Parental Rights: A court must make findings in accordance with 41-3-406 (renumbered 41-3-438), 41-3-607, and 41-3-609 before it can terminate parental rights and award permanent custody of any child to the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services). In re C.A.R. & P.J.R., 214 M 174, 693 P2d 1214, 41 St. Rep. 2395 (1984).

Termination of Parental Rights — No Right to Jury Trial: The State began termination of parental rights proceedings in the District Court. The parents filed a jury demand. The court denied the motion, citing 41-3-607. The court consolidated the adjudicatory and dispositional hearings, found the youths to be "in need of care", found that the parents had not complied with the approved treatment plan, found them to be beyond rehabilitation, and terminated their parental rights. The parents appealed the denial of the jury trial, alleging that 41-3-607(4) was unconstitutional pursuant to Art. II, sec. 24, of the 1972 Montana Constitution. The Supreme Court held that in Montana the state constitution guarantees the right to a jury trial only in the class of cases in which the right was enjoyed when the constitution was adopted. When the constitution was first adopted in 1889, there was no right to a jury trial in parental rights termination proceedings because such proceedings did not exist. Because there was no right to a jury trial for civil proceedings to terminate parental rights when the Montana Constitution was adopted in 1889 and recodified in 1972, such right could not be brought within the protection of Art. II, sec. 26, of the 1972 Montana Constitution. Because the adjudicatory and dispositional hearings may be consolidated, as was the case here, the court held it was unlikely the Legislature intended to provide for a jury trial at the adjudicatory hearing but not at the dispositional hearing. 2001 Amendment: Chapter 83 near beginning after "relationship" deleted "based on abandonment", after "whether the" substituted "provisions of 41-3-428 and 41-3-429" for "rules of civil procedure", after "process" deleted "on the parents", and deleted former second and third sentences that read: "If the parents were not served personally, the petitioner must file an affidavit stating what efforts have been made to locate the parent or parents of the child. The affidavit must be filed at least 10 days prior to the hearing." Amendment effective March 20, 2001.

Saving Clause: Section 8, Ch. 83, L. 2001, was a saving clause.

Case Notes

Petition for Long-Term Custody Included With Petition for Termination of Parental Rights — No Requirement for Filing Subsequent to Hearing: The state petitioned to terminate the mother's parental rights or, alternatively, to grant long-term custody to the state with the right to assign guardianship to the children's grandmother. Because the District Court combined the permanency hearing with the termination hearing, the petition for long-term legal custody was not filed subsequent to the hearing, which the mother contended violated 41-3-412 (renumbered 41-3-445) and erroneously denied her sufficient notice. However, 41-3-412 (renumbered 41-3-445) does not require that a petition for long-term custody be filed subsequent to a hearing. That petition may be filed at the same time as a petition to terminate parental rights, and this alternative petition provides a parent with adequate notice of issues to be raised at the hearing. Thus, the court did not err in awarding long-term custody without requiring a separate petition limited to that issue. In re Custody & Parental Rights of T.Z. & J.Z., 2000 MT 205, 300 M 522, 6 P3d 960, 57 St. Rep. 806 (2000).

Lack of Personal Notice — Due Process Not Violated: Mother abandoned her children after two failed treatment plans and neglected to apprise the Department of Family Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) of her whereabouts for over 90 days prior to initiation of termination proceedings, during which time Department efforts to contact her were unsuccessful. Relying on 41-3-401 (renumbered 41-3-422), she later argued that because she was not personally served with notice of the termination proceedings, her due process rights were violated. However, this section outlines the notice requirements applicable to parent-child relationship termination proceedings. The District Court, after noting the Department's efforts to locate mother and the fact that she was under actual notice from the onset of Department involvement that her parental rights could be terminated if she failed to follow court-ordered treatment plans, properly held that the notice requirements of this section were satisfied. In re A.E., C.E., S.R., & J.R., 255 M 56, 840 P2d 572, 49 St. Rep. 877 (1992).

2003 Amendments — Composite Section: Chapter 44 in (4)(b) at end inserted "within a reasonable time". Amendment effective February 26, 2003.

Chapter 504 in (1) after "finding" inserted "established by clear and convincing evidence, except as provided in the federal Indian Child Welfare Act and if applicable"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2003.

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 44, L. 2003, provided: "WHEREAS, in In re C.R.O., 2002 MT 50, 309 Mont. 48, 43 P.3d 913 (2002), the concurring opinions urged the Legislature to revisit section 41-3-609(4)(b), MCA, concerning termination of parental rights without requiring a treatment plan."

1999 Amendments — Composite Section: Chapter 395 in (4)(d) substituted "45-2-101" for "45-2-101(64)". Amendment effective October 1, 1999.

Chapter 566 at end of (1)(b) after "parents" deleted "as set forth in 41-3-102"; deleted former (1)(c) that read: "(c) the identity of the parent is unknown and has been unknown for a period of 90 days and reasonable efforts to identify and locate the parent have failed"; inserted (1)(d) relating to circumstances listed in 41-3-403(2)(a) through (2)(e); inserted (1)(e) relating to putative father meeting criteria listed in 41-3-403(3)(a) through (3)(c); deleted former (1)(f) that read: "(f) the parent has substantially failed to successfully complete or meet the goals of a treatment plan approved by the court and the child has been in an out-of-home placement for a cumulative total period of 1 year or longer"; deleted former (2)(c) that read: "(c) a single incident of life-threatening or gravely disabling injury to or disfigurement of a child caused by the parent"; deleted former (2)(f) and (2)(g) that read: "(f) the injury or death of a child because of proven abuse or neglect; and

(g) any reasonable efforts by protective service agencies that have been unable to rehabilitate the parent"; in (3) deleted former second sentence that read: "The court shall review and, if necessary, order an evaluation of the child's or the parent's physical, mental, and emotional conditions"; inserted (4)(a) relating to parents who meet criteria of subsections (1)(a)

through (1)(e); in (4)(c) after "is" inserted "or will be" and at end substituted "and reunification of the child with the parent is not in the best interests of the child because of the child's circumstances, including placement options, age, and developmental, cognitive, and psychological needs" for "and a treatment plan is not practical considering the incarceration"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 1999.

1997 Amendments: Chapter 480 at end of (1)(a) substituted "42-2-402 and 42-2-412" for "40-6-135"; and made minor changes in style.

Chapter 514 in (1)(b) substituted "41-3-102" for "41-3-102(7)(e)"; in (2)(f) and (4)(c) substituted "child" for "sibling"; in (4)(a) inserted "or clinical psychologists" and after "the parent" deleted "is so severely mentally ill that the parent"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective May 2, 1997.

Chapter 516 in (1)(b), at end, substituted "41-3-102(8)(e)" for "41-3-102(7)(e)" (voided by Ch. 514); inserted (1)(c) regarding a parent whose identity is unknown; inserted (1)(d) regarding a parent convicted of certain felonies; deleted former (1)(d) that read: "(d) the parent has failed to successfully complete a treatment plan approved by the court within the time periods allowed for the child to be in foster care under 41-3-410 unless it orders other permanent legal custody under 41-3-410"; inserted (1)(f) regarding a parent who fails to complete a treatment plan; in (2)(f), after "death of a", substituted "child" for "sibling" and after "proven" deleted "parental"; in (4)(c), after "death", substituted "or serious bodily injury, as defined in 45-2-101(64), of a child" for "of a sibling"; deleted (5) that read: "(5) If a person is convicted of a felony in which sexual intercourse occurred or if a minor is adjudicated a delinquent youth because of an act that, if committed by an adult, would be a felony in which sexual intercourse occurred and, as a result of the sexual intercourse, a child is born, the court may terminate the offender's parental rights to the child at any time after the conviction or adjudication"; and made minor changes in style.

Severability: Section 172, Ch. 480, L. 1997, was a severability clause.

Applicability: Section 173, Ch. 480, L. 1997 provided: "(1) [Sections 1 through 156] [Title 42, chapters 1 through 7, and Title 52, chapter 8] apply to proceedings commenced on or after October 1, 1997.

(2) A petition for adoption filed prior to October 1, 1997, is governed by the law in effect at the time the petition was filed.

(3) The putative father registry requirements apply to children born on or after October 1, 1997."

1995 Amendment: Chapter 458 in (1)(b) substituted "41-3-102(7)(e)" for "41-3-102(8)(d)"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 14, 1995.

Code Commissioner Correction: In (1)(b), pursuant to the authority contained in sec. 73, Ch. 18, L. 1995, the Code Commissioner substituted reference to 41-3-102(7)(e) for reference to 41-3-102(8)(d).

Severability: Section 4, Ch. 369, L. 1995, was a severability clause.

Effective Date: Section 5, Ch. 369, L. 1995, provided that subsection (5) is effective April 12, 1995.

1993 Amendment: Chapter 439 at end of (1)(b) substituted reference to 41-3-102(8)(d) for reference to 41-3-102(7)(d).

1991 Amendment: Inserted (1)(d) regarding parental completion of a court-ordered treatment plan; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1991.

1985 Amendments: Chapters 15 and 388 in (1)(a) substituted "40-6-135" for "40-6-132 through 40-6-134".

Chapter 388 inserted (4) establishing when a treatment plan is not required.

GENERAL

No Showing of Ineffective Assistance of Counsel for Counsel's Failure to Argue Alternatives — Termination of Parental Rights Affirmed: In a hearing in which the District Court terminated a father's parental rights, the father's counsel did not provide ineffective assistance by failing to advocate for appropriate alternatives to termination of parental rights. Counsel argued against granting the petition for termination, and the question of alternatives had not yet arisen. In re B.M. and P.M., 2010 MT 114, 356 Mont. 327, 233 P.3d 338.

Long-Term Incarceration Rendering Parent's Unfitness Unlikely to Change — Termination of Parental Rights Affirmed: The District Court did not clearly err in terminating a mother's parental rights after finding that the mother's long-term incarceration in federal prison rendered her unfit and was unlikely to change within a reasonable time. Termination of parental rights was affirmed. In re B.S. & G.S., 2009 MT 113, 350 M 132, 206 P3d 74 (2009).

Sufficient Evidence to Terminate Rights of Incarcerated Parent: The District Court did not abuse its discretion in terminating the parental rights of an incarcerated parent after citing: (1) the fact that the child would have been in foster placement for more than 15 of the most recent months before the parent was eligible for parole, thus satisfying the presumption in 43-1-604(1); (2) the parent's criminal history, including seven prior felonies and four sentence revocations; (3) the parent's history of voluntary underemployment, despite the parent's asserted wish to support the child; (4) the parent's failure to establish a substantial relationship with the child through visits or regular contact; (5) the failure of the parent to manifest an ability to assume legal and physical custody because of incarceration; (6) the child's need for immediate permanent placement in order to meet the child's developmental, cognitive, and psychological stability needs; and (7) the inability of the parent to provide for immediate placement because of incarceration. The parent appealed on grounds that the District Court improperly relied on the presumption in 41-3-604(1). The Supreme Court agreed that the presumption was not satisfied because the child had not been in foster care for the requisite amount of time. However, the court noted that parental rights may properly be terminated if the District Court correctly relies on any one basis set out in 41-3-609. In this case, the District Court correctly relied on several bases other than the statutory presumption and thus did not abuse its discretion in terminating the parent's rights. In re M.P., 2008 MT 39, 341 M 333, 177 P3d 495 (2008).

Mother Allowed to Challenge Trial Court's Findings Respecting Her Treatment Plan Resulting in Termination of Her Parental Rights: The appellant did not object to any of the procedures followed in the lower court proceedings concerning the termination of her parental rights but did argue that the trial court erred in rendering its factual findings. The Supreme Court stated that parental rights are a fundamental liberty interest that must be protected by fundamentally fair procedures and that the lower court's finding of fact were subject to review as to whether the findings were clearly erroneous. The trial court found that the appellant had performed some of the requirements of the treatment plan but had failed to meet other parts, including urinalysis testing. The lower court ruled that in failing to perform all required tasks, the appellant had failed to achieve the overall changes contemplated by the treatment plan. The Supreme Court rejected the appellant's argument that the Supreme Court could excuse noncompliance with any particular aspect of the treatment plan and held that the lower court was correct in finding that the treatment plan had not been fully complied with and that therefore the mother's parental rights should be terminated. In re D. F., 2007 MT 147, 337 M 461, 161 P3d 825 (2007).

Findings Based on More Than Prior Conviction for Crime Against Child — Sufficient Findings to Substantiate Termination of Parental Rights: A father asserted that the District Court lacked sufficient evidence to terminate his parental rights because the court relied on a prior crime committed in Texas that, if committed in Montana, would have been only a misdemeanor. The Supreme Court found that substantial evidence existed to support termination. In addition to the prior sexual crime against a child that was an aggravating circumstance under Montana law, the District Court also found that the father had no significant contact with his children for more than 3 years and failed to complete a treatment plan, that the children had been in foster care for 28 months prior to the termination hearing, and that there was evidence that one of the children claimed that the father sexually abused her. Termination of parental rights was affirmed. In re. M.A.L., D.L., & T.L., 2006 MT 299, 334 M 436, 148 P3d 606 (2006).

Preservation or Reunification Services Not Required When Child Subjected to Aggravating Circumstances: The state does not need to make reasonable efforts to provide family preservation or reunification services if a court finds that a parent has subjected a child to any of the aggravating circumstances listed in 41-3-423(2)(a). In re M.A.L., D.L., & T.L., 2006 MT 299, 334 M 436, 148 P3d 606 (2006).

Inability of Father to Assume Role of Parent Within Reasonable Time — Parental Rights Properly Terminated: The District Court terminated a father's parental rights based on the testimony of two clinical psychologists that it was unlikely that the father would be able to parent within a reasonable time. The father appealed on grounds that the District Court relied on testimony that was based on an evaluation made before the father engaged in various treatments through the prison system. Although the father took steps to rehabilitate himself, his extensive criminal history and lack of responsibility for behavior that made him unavailable to parent his child contradicted his claims of rehabilitation. Given the father's extensive history with mental instability, aggression, and crime, the District Court did not abuse its discretion in concluding that the father could not assume the role of parent within a reasonable time and in terminating parental rights in the best interests of the child. In re A.J.E., 2006 MT 41, 331 M 198, 130 P3d 612 (2006).

Res Judicata and Collateral Estoppel — Inapplicable Absent Final Judgment: In In re B.N.Y., 2003 MT 241, 317 M 291, 77 P3d 189 (2003), the Supreme Court held that a mother's due process rights were violated in parental rights termination proceedings. Almost immediately after the 2003 decision, the state began new proceedings. The mother asserted that res judicata and collateral estoppel barred the new action. The District Court disagreed, and the mother appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Both res judicata and collateral estoppel require a final judgment in an initial action before they preclude a similar future action. The initial order terminating the mother's parental rights did not constitute a final judgment as a result of In re B.N.Y. The 2003 decision had no preclusive effect in the current action, and the mother's res judicata and collateral estoppel arguments failed. In re B.N.Y., 2006 MT 34, 331 M 145, 130 P3d 594 (2006). See also Baltrusch v. Baltrusch, 2006 MT 51, 331 M 281, 130 P3d 1267 (2006).

Evidence of History of Violence — Consideration Not Limited to Parent or to Violence of Another Committed During Course of Relationship With Parent — Converse Fallacy of Accident or Hasty Generalization: In a child abuse and neglect proceeding, the physician doing psychological evaluations of the parents was given documents that referred to the father's alleged history of violence in another state. On appeal of the termination of parental rights, the mother argued that because she was neither dating nor married to the father at the time of the alleged violence, the doctor should not have considered the father's violent history in evaluating her. The mother relied on three cases in which evidence of violence by a spouse or intimate partner that was committed during the course of the relationship with the parent, who is the subject of the inquiry, was held admissible. The Supreme Court held that the cases cited by the mother do not require a court to exclude any evidence if that evidence is relevant. If the evidence is admissible in court, a fortiori, it is admissible in the psychologist's evaluation. By relying on the cited cases, the mother committed the converse fallacy of accident or hasty generalization. In re D.B., 2004 MT 371, 325 M 13, 103 P3d 1026 (2004).

Lack of Fitness Unlikely to Change Within Reasonable Time — Consideration of Past Conduct Permissible: The mother was diagnosed with mental illnesses in sufficient number, degree of severity, and effect on the children's welfare to support the District Court's conclusion that the mother was unlikely to change within a reasonable amount of time. The father's mental illnesses and violent tendencies posed a danger to the children's future welfare. The District Court did not commit clear error in determining that the father was unlikely to change within a reasonable amount of time. In re D.B., 2004 MT 371, 325 M 13, 103 P3d 1026 (2004).

Misdiagnosis of Rare Skin Disease as Evidence of Parental Sexual Misconduct — Newly Acquired Evidence Did Not Undermine Validity of Adjudication of Children as Youths in Need of Care — Termination of Parental Rights Upheld: After the parents' 4-year-old daughter was diagnosed as a probable victim of parental sexual misconduct, the court ordered a TIA and protective services for all five children, who were all under 5 years of age. Both parents were criminally charged with abuse and neglect of their children. The father remained in jail for 1 year. The children were tested and found to be developmentally delayed in their speech, and both parents were diagnosed with psychological disorders. Both parents were ordered to complete treatment plans, which they failed to complete. Eventually, their parental rights were terminated. Two years after the initial diagnosis, it was determined that the daughter's physical symptoms were the result of a rare skin disease called lichens sclerosis et atrophicus (LSA) rather than sexual abuse. The parents appealed the termination of their parental rights and argued that the District Court had erred in adjudicating the children as youths in need of care based on the misdiagnosis. The parents further argued that the allegations of sexual molestation because of the misdiagnosis tainted the entire proceedings to such a degree that they were deprived of their rights to due process and fundamental fairness, thereby invalidating the subsequent termination ruling. The Supreme Court upheld the District Court and held that, based on the developmental delays and psychological disorders, the District Court had adequate grounds independent of the LSA misdiagnosis for adjudicating the children as youths in need of care under 41-3-422 and that the subsequent termination under this section was valid. In re D.B., 2004 MT 371, 325 M 13, 103 P3d 1026 (2004).

De Minimis Amount of Inadmissible Evidence in Findings — Adoption of State's Findings Not Reversible Error: The District Court issued findings and conclusions substantially similar to those proposed by the state, including a de minimis amount of inadmissible evidence. Nevertheless, on appeal, the Supreme Court concluded that, although discouraged, verbatim adoption of a prevailing party's proposed findings did not constitute error per se and that in this case, the careless but harmless inclusion of such a small amount of inadmissible evidence did not warrant reversing the ultimate decision terminating parental rights. In re M.W., K.W., & A.L., 2004 MT 301, 323 M 433, 102 P3d 6 (2004). See also In re Marriage of Allison, 269 M 250, 887 P2d 1217 (1994).

Rights Terminated for Failure to Complete Treatment Plan, Criminal Activity, Inability to Parent, Likely Harm to Child if Returned to Parent, and Child's Best Interests: In a proceeding subject to the Indian Child Welfare Act of 1978, the father's parental rights with respect to a 4-year-old girl were properly terminated based on findings of fact and conclusions of law that he failed to complete several treatment plans, that he was involved in criminal activity before and after the proceeding was begun, that he had not made substantial changes that would allow for safe parenting, that serious emotional or physical harm would likely occur if the child were returned to him, and that the child's best interests would be served by the termination. In re M.D.M., 2002 MT 305, 313 M 51, 59 P3d 1142 (2002).

Termination for Serious Injuries to Baby, Incarceration and Parole Violations, Chemical Dependency, and Failure to Comply With Treatment Plan or Improve Parenting Skills: Parental rights of a father in his late teens were properly terminated. He inflicted numerous serious injuries on his 2-week-old son. He did nothing to improve his parenting skills, was chemically dependent, and did not comply or attempt to comply with the treatment plan. During his incarceration for injuring his son, he was cited for numerous major rule violations, including assault; made graphically violent drawings that expressed hatred, satanic overtones, death, and mutilation; and recited Marilyn Manson lyrics. He did not comply with the conditions of his parole. In re A.S., 2002 MT 265, 312 M 277, 59 P3d 382 (2002).

Termination of Parental Rights — Requirements of Indian Child Welfare Act: Under the Indian Child Welfare Act of 1978, 25 U.S.C. 1901, et seq., the party seeking termination of an individual's parental rights to an Indian child under state law must satisfy the court that active efforts have been made to provide remedial services and rehabilitative programs designed to prevent the breakup of the Indian family and that the efforts have proved unsuccessful. The party seeking termination has the burden of proving beyond a reasonable doubt that the continued custody of the child by the parent or Indian custodian is likely to result in serious emotional or physical damage to the child. In re Custody of A.L.R., A.A.R., & T.C.R., 2002 MT 183, 311 M 76, 54 P3d 17 (2002). See also In re I.B., 2011 MT 82, 360 Mont. 132, 255 P.3d 56.

Recognition of Statutory Presumption Coupled With Parental Rights Termination Criteria — Parental Rights Properly Terminated: A mother contended that the District Court erred in terminating her parental rights by inappropriately relying on the statutory presumption in 41-3-604, contrary to the termination criteria in this section. The children had been in foster care for more than 15 of the most recent 22 months, so the presumption in 41-3-604 applied, but the presumption neither eliminates the substantive requirements of this section nor diminishes the clear and convincing burden of proof on the party seeking to terminate parental rights. However, in this case, the District Court both acknowledged the statutory presumption and considered the termination criteria, which included evidence that the mother had not successfully completed her treatment program and had two significantly handicapping conditions (marginal general aptitude and a personality disorder) that rendered her unfit to parent and that would not change within the foreseeable future. Thus, the mother's parental rights were properly terminated. In re B.H. & D.H., 2001 MT 288, 307 M 412, 37 P3d 736 (2001).

Circumstances Related to Termination of Parental Rights to First Child Relevant to Ability to Care for Second Child: The District Court noted that a mother's parental rights to her first child, S.P., had been terminated and concluded that, because the circumstances related to the termination in S.P.'s case were still present and relevant to the mother's ability to care for her second child, C.P., the mother's parental rights to C.P. should be terminated as well. The mother appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Pursuant to subsection (1)(d) of this section, the parent-child relationship may be terminated if the parent has subjected the child to any of the circumstances listed in 41-3-423(2), including when a parent has had parental rights to the child's sibling or other child of the parent involuntarily terminated and the circumstances related to the termination of parental rights are relevant to the parent's ability to adequately care for the child at issue. The District Court did not abuse its discretion in holding that the circumstances related to the termination in S.P.'s case were still present and relevant to the mother's ability to care for C.P., that continuation of the parent-child relationship would likely result in substantial risk of harm to C.P., and that it was in C.P.'s best interests that parental rights be terminated. In re C.P., 2001 MT 187, 306 M 238, 32 P3d 754 (2001).

No Authority to Grant Third-Party Petition for Parenting Plan Absent Termination of Parental Rights: A young, single mother left her child in the temporary care of the Knopps, her aunt and uncle, while she sought employment and a place to live. About 2 months after the child was left with them, the Knopps petitioned for a parenting plan and support for the child. Although the document was referred to as a petition for a parenting plan, child support, and medical support, it was the functional equivalent of a petition for permanent custody. The Knopps applied for temporary custody and received it, ex parte, so that when the mother returned and tried to remove the child to their new home, she was not allowed to do so. The mother then sought termination of the guardianship and the return of her child. The mother's parental rights were never terminated or suspended by the state or county, nor were any proceedings ever commenced to demonstrate that the child was abused, dependent, or neglected. The District Court dismissed the petition, relying on In re Guardianship of D.T.N., 275 M 480, 914 P2d 579 (1996), in holding that the mother had a constitutional right to custody of her child and that permanent guardianship could not be granted because the mother's parental rights had not been terminated or suspended. The Knopps appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. The rule of law does not permit destruction of a natural parent's fundamental right to the custody of a child based simply on the subjective determination of the child's best interests. Rather, a natural parent cannot be denied custody of a child absent termination of parental rights for abuse or neglect pursuant to Title 41, ch. 3. In re Parenting of J.N.P., 2001 MT 120, 305 M 351, 27 P3d 953 (2001). See also In re A.R.A., 276 M 66, 919 P2d 388 (1996), and Girard v. Williams, 1998 MT 231, 291 M 49, 966 P2d 1155 (1998).

Statutory Termination Criteria Met:

A family preservation treatment plan listed four goals: (1) a plan for reunification; (2) a safety plan for the children; (3) timelines; and (4) a backup plan, including concurrent placement. The parents acknowledged that they did not comply with the goal of completing tasks within the established timelines, and the Department had been working with the parents for more than a year to get them to complete the treatment plans in order to reunify the family. Safety and cleanliness goals were not met, and psychological profiles of the parents indicated a lack of ability to provide a safe and appropriate home environment for their young children. There was little evidence that the condition rendering the parents unfit was likely to change within a reasonable time. The parents' compliance with the various treatment plans was characterized by a pattern of increasing their efforts as hearings approached and then slipping back into their previous behavior patterns. The statutory criteria for terminating parental rights was met, and the District Court did not err in doing so. The parents' contention of District Court error in finding that the mother had lost custody of another child because of her inability to parent, which was unsupported in the record, did not constitute grounds for dismissal because the error would have had no significant impact on the result and was therefore harmless. In re C.B. & J.B., 2001 MT 42, 304 M 252, 20 P3d 117 (2001).

Termination of parental rights was proper where evidence showed that: (1) parents did not challenge adjudication that children were youths in need of care; (2) court-approved treatment plans were unsuccessful; (3) the father's sexual conduct toward his daughter and his failure to obtain counseling rendered him unfit to provide adequate parental care; and (4) the conduct or condition that rendered the father unfit was unlikely to change within a reasonable time. In re T.M.M., 234 M 283, 762 P2d 866, 45 St. Rep. 1909 (1988).

Termination of Parental Rights Not Precluded by Conflicting or Ambiguous Expert Testimony: The father of three children appealed from a District Court ruling terminating his parental rights based on evidence that neither parent had complied with six treatment plans and that the parents remained unfit, unwilling, or unable to given their children adequate parental care. In affirming the District Court's termination of parental rights, the Supreme Court ruled that the existence of conflicting or ambiguous evidence presented by therapists regarding the father's progress in demonstrating any improvement in parenting skills does not preclude a termination of parental rights when the parent's conduct rendering him unfit to provide adequate care is unlikely to change within a reasonable time. In re C.D.S., S.E.S., & T.M.S., 2000 MT 313, 302 M 466, 14 P3d 1248, 57 St. Rep. 1327 (2000).

Finding That Jail Not Child-Friendly Place for Parental Visitation — Parental Incarceration Not Controlling Factor in Termination of Parental Rights: As part of its findings in terminating the rights of a parent who was incarcerated, the District Court held that a jail is not a child-friendly environment or an appropriate place for a parent-child visit. The parent appealed on grounds that the court erroneously made the implication from that finding that the parent's requests for visits were inappropriate and that the implication inappropriately colored the court's determination that the parent could not become an adequate parent within a reasonable time, amounting to an almost de facto determination that parents who are incarcerated cannot satisfactorily rehabilitate themselves to resume the parenting role. The Supreme Court disagreed and affirmed, finding that the parent's incarceration was not a controlling consideration. Substantial credible evidence supported the conclusion that jail is not a child-friendly place, and undisputed evidence that the parent neglected the child, made no progress on court-approved treatment plans, tested positive for drugs, was repeatedly incarcerated for crimes committed in the child's presence, and allowed unknown persons to care for the child was sufficient to support the conclusion that parental rights should be terminated. In re C.A., 2000 MT 227, 301 M 233, 8 P3d 116, 57 St. Rep. 931 (2000).

Findings Sufficient to Warrant Assignment to Long-Term Custody: The state petitioned to terminate the mother's parental rights or, alternatively, to grant long-term custody to the state with the right to assign guardianship to the children's grandmother. The District Court granted the latter. The mother did not contend that the court's findings were erroneous, but did argue that the court erred because its findings were not sufficiently specific to justify long-term custody to the state. The Supreme Court disagreed, noting that if the state follows fundamentally fair procedures, a parent may be divested of custody. Here, the District Court found that: (1) the children were youths in need of care; (2) the state had developed treatment plans for the mother, but the plans had not been followed; (3) the mother was warned that the last treatment plan was her final chance; (4) the mother had been given many opportunities to straighten out and retain custody of her children, but did not do so; (5) continuation of the parent-child legal relationship would likely result in continued abuse or neglect if the children were returned to the mother; (6) the mother's conduct and condition rendered her unfit, unable, and unwilling to give her children adequate parental care; (7) it would be in the children's best interest if they were allowed to visit with their mother as directed by the state, even if she was not their custodian; (8) since the children had been living with their grandmother, they had improved in school and become more socially involved; and (9) the grandmother was willing to act as the children's guardian. These findings were sufficiently specific to support the District Court's award of long-term custody to the children's grandmother, and that award was affirmed. In re Custody & Parental Rights of T.Z. & J.Z., 2000 MT 205, 300 M 522, 6 P3d 960, 57 St. Rep. 806 (2000).

Proper Termination of Parental Rights Based on Conviction for Sexual Assault of Child and Sexual Intercourse Without Consent With Child: Snyder pleaded guilty to sexual assault on a child and sexual intercourse without consent with a child based on his involvement with three young girls. His marriage was dissolved 6 months later and custody was awarded to his former wife, who remarried and then petitioned for termination of Snyder's parental rights so that their son could be adopted by her new husband. The petition was granted, and Snyder appealed. The plain language of 42-2-608 provides that the court may terminate a parent's rights and make the child available for adoption if a parent is convicted of sexual assault on a child or sexual intercourse without consent with a child. There is no statutory requirement that the sexual assault on a child or sexual intercourse without consent with a child has been committed on the adoptee. The trial court did not err when it held that clear and convincing evidence supported the termination of the father's parental rights based on his prior convictions. In re Adoption of Snyder, 2000 MT 61, 299 M 40, 996 P2d 875, 57 St. Rep. 288 (2000), following In re J.N. & A.N., 1999 MT 64, 293 M 524, 977 P2d 317, 56 St. Rep. 269 (1999).

Court Refusing to Terminate Parental Rights for One Child and Not for Second Child: Stephanie argued that the District Court's decision to terminate her parental rights with respect to one child and not with respect to her second child was reversible as being logically inconsistent. The Supreme Court held that the record contained evidence showing that she could handle the parenting of one child but was not up to the task of raising two children and therefore the lower court's decision was valid. Probate Code Permanent Guardianship Proceeding — Dependency or Neglect Not Grounds for Terminating Mother's Custody of Child: A mother's parental rights were not terminated by circumstance when a court order granted, with her consent, temporary guardianship in the paternal grandparents. A later court, on the grandparents' petition for permanent guardianship under the Uniform Probate Code, found that the child was neglected or dependent and that the child's best interests would be served by granting the petition. The mother appeared in and contested the later action, withdrew her consent, and filed a petition to terminate the temporary guardianship. The guardianship provisions of the Uniform Probate Code were never intended as a substitute for the child custody provisions of Title 40 governing dissolution of marriage or for the procedures of this title governing termination of the parent-child relationship. The court relied on cases stating that a dependent neglected best interests of the child determination could not be made in a Uniform Probate Code permanent guardianship proceeding and had to be made under a child custody or parental termination proceeding. In re Guardianship of D.T.N., 275 M 480, 914 P2d 579, 53 St. Rep. 253 (1996).

Medical and Psychological Evaluations of Youth: In a proceeding to terminate parental rights, the rights of the child must be given paramount consideration, and when the evidence supports the court's expressed finding that an immediate evaluation of the youth was in the child's best interest, the court erred in denying a motion for medical and psychological evaluations of the child. In re J.J.G., 266 M 274, 880 P2d 808, 51 St. Rep. 793 (1994).

Mental Disease and Inability to Provide Care or Meet Treatment Plan — Parental Rights Terminated: The following facts and conclusions warranted termination of parental rights: (1) mother suffered from chronic schizophrenia, a borderline personality disorder, paranoia, and active hallucinations; (2) the children were found to be youths in need of care; (3) mother was incapable of adhering to any proposed treatment plan; and (4) mother was unfit and unable to provide adequate parental care, and her conduct and condition were unlikely to change within a reasonable amount of time. In re A.N.S. & L.M.R., 252 M 279, 828 P2d 1357, 49 St. Rep. 250 (1992).

Termination of Parental Rights Proper After Death of One Child and Consideration of Statutory Factors: After properly considering the statutory criteria of this section, especially the efforts exerted by the Department of Family Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) in trying to rehabilitate the mother as well as the circumstances surrounding the death of one child and the abuse and neglect of three others, the District Court did not err in finding that the treatment plan was unsuccessful, that the mother's conduct or condition was unlikely to improve within a reasonable time, and that it was in the children's best interests to terminate parental rights. In re J.H., S.H., & N.H., 252 M 31, 825 P2d 1222, 49 St. Rep. 112 (1992).

Parental Rights Terminated — Alcohol, Drug, Emotional, and Stability Problems — Failure to Complete Treatment: The District Court did not abuse its discretion or err in finding that the conduct of mother whose parental rights were terminated rendered her unfit as a parent and was unlikely to change within a reasonable time. Among other things, mother: (1) left the children with their grandmother because she "decided to screw off my life" as children's father had; (2) had a history of chronic drug and alcohol abuse and of emotional problems stemming from childhood; (3) was recently hospitalized, once for depression and twice for pill overdoses; (4) had recently abandoned the children for a 9-day period at the end of which the Department placed them with their grandmother; and (5) failed to complete a three-part court-ordered program aimed at evaluating and treating her problems and helping her provide a stable home and environment for the children. In re Custody & Parental Rights of N.J. & A.J., 250 M 198, 819 P2d 166, 48 St. Rep. 752 (1991).

Award of Long-Term Custody Not Considered Termination of Parental Rights: An award of long-term custody under 41-3-406 (renumbered 41-3-438) is not equivalent to a termination of parental rights requiring that the statutory factors of this section be met. In re R.T.L.P., 238 M 384, 777 P2d 892, 46 St. Rep. 1354 (1989).

Three Prerequisites for Termination of Parental Rights: The Supreme Court found substantial credible evidence that the three prerequisites for termination of parental rights were met: (1) that S.B. was a youth in need of care under the statutory definitions of 41-3-102 since the child failed to thrive due to carelessness of the parent (citing In re C.A.R. & P.J.R., 214 M 174, 693 P2d 1214, 41 St. Rep. 2395 (1984)); (2) that a court-approved treatment plan was unsuccessful (citing In re R.J.W., 197 M 286, 642 P2d 1072, 39 St. Rep. 568 (1982)); and (3) that the conduct or condition rendering the parent unfit to provide adequate care was unlikely to change within a reasonable time (citing In re R.J.W., supra). PROCEDURE

Termination of Parental Rights Under ICWA: A mother argued that the failure to hold an expert hearing under the Indian Child Welfare Act before the children were removed from her home did not satisfy the requirements of 25 U.S.C. 1912(e). The Supreme Court held that the District Court did not abuse its discretion by terminating the mother's parental rights because the termination was conducted according to the requirements of state and federal statutes and that the record clearly supported the District Court's findings of facts and conclusions of law. In re A.S. and T.S., 2011 MT 69, 360 Mont. 55, 253 P.3d 799.

Department's Reunification Efforts Held Reasonable — Termination of Parental Rights Over Siblings Held Sufficient Justification — No Abuse of Discretion: After the District Court terminated a mother's parental rights over her child C.J., the mother appealed, claiming as unreasonable the 4 ½ months that passed between the petition by the Department of Public Health and Human Services (Department) to be exempted from the "reasonable efforts" for reunification requirement under 41-3-423(2)(e), because the mother's rights over C.J.'s two siblings had also been terminated, and the date of the hearing. The Supreme Court held that the Department's efforts were reasonable notwithstanding the Department's petition, that there was no timeline provided in the statutes for the hearing, that the delay in holding the hearing did not subject the mother to a fundamentally unfair proceeding, and that the mother was correctly not given a treatment plan because her circumstances met the requirements of 41-3-609(1)(d) and 41-3-423(2)(e) regarding termination of a mother's rights over one child because her rights over other siblings were previously terminated. Therefore, the Supreme Court held that there was no abuse of discretion by the District Court in terminating the mother's parental rights over C.J. In re C.J., 2010 MT 179, 357 Mont. 219, 237 P.3d 1282.

Lack of Effective Counsel During Parental Rights Termination Hearing — Remand: Appellant father asserted that he received ineffective assistance of counsel during parental rights termination proceedings. The Supreme Court examined the quality of advocacy demonstrated at the adjudication hearing and agreed. The father's counsel failed to object to hearsay evidence presented during the hearing and did not file a response to the state's brief in support of admission of the evidence, which resulted in the automatic admission of the evidence. In addition counsel made no objections at the hearing, asked no questions on cross-examination, and failed to meet with the father prior to the hearing or request an extension to do so. Thus, the father received ineffective assistance of counsel, warranting remand. In re J.J.L., D.J.L., and R.D.L.L., 2010 MT 4, 355 Mont. 23, 223 P.3d 921, following In re A.S., 2004 MT 62, 320 Mont. 268, 87 P.3d 408.

No Error in Finding Inapplicability of Indian Child Welfare Act to Parental Rights Termination Proceeding: At a hearing to terminate a father's parental rights, the father listed three Indian tribes that he thought either he or the children's mother was affiliated with. The District Court found that although the father was an enrolled member of one of the tribes, the children were not eligible or enrolled with that tribe. The father also asserted that he might have connections to a second tribe because of the mother's alleged membership, but in order for the Indian Child Welfare Act (ICWA) to apply, the child must be either a tribal member or eligible for tribal membership and be the biological child of a tribal member. Because the father could not assert that he was a member of the second tribe, the children could not qualify as members of the second tribe. The father also contended that there was possible heritage with a third tribe through the mother's father, but neither he nor the mother was a tribal member, so the children could not be biological children of a member of the third tribe. Additionally, any connection the children had with the third tribe through their maternal grandfather was preserved by their mother's continued custody and care. Therefore, the District Court did not err in finding that ICWA did not apply. In re J.J.L., D.J.L., and R.D.L.L., 2010 MT 4, 355 Mont. 23, 223 P.3d 921.

Facial Showing of Competence in Counsel's Representation of Mother in Parental Rights Termination Proceedings — Ineffective Counsel Claims Dismissed: A mother raised several claims concerning the effectiveness of counsel she received during proceedings to terminate her parental rights. The Supreme Court examined the record and found that the mother's trial attorney provided her with vigorous and competent representation. There was no showing or argument concerning trial counsel's training and experience, and there was facially competent representation in the trial record. The mother failed to establish a threshold showing of ineffective assistance of counsel, and her claims were therefore without merit. In re C.M.C., 2009 MT 153, 350 M 391, 208 P3d 809 (2009).

No Error in Denial of Continuance of Parental Rights Termination Proceeding to Determine Placement of Children: During his testimony at a hearing on termination of a father's parental rights, the father requested a continuance in order for a hearing to be held regarding whether placement of the children with their grandparents was in the children's best interests. The District Court denied the request, and on appeal the Supreme Court affirmed. The question of possible placement of the children had no bearing on whether the statutory criteria for terminating the father's parental rights had been established, and the District Court did not abuse its discretion in declining to delay final determination of the father's parental rights. In re

B.S. & G.S., 2009 MT 98, 350 M 86, 206 P3d 565 (2009). See also In re O.A.W., 2007 MT 13, 335 M 304, 153 P3d 6 (2007).

Proper Consideration of Circumstances of Prior Involuntary Termination of Parental Rights — Clear and Convincing Evidence to Support Termination of Rights to Subsequent Child: The parents contended that there was no clear and convincing evidence to support termination of their parental rights to A.H.D. based on the prior involuntary termination of their rights to two other children. The Supreme Court disagreed. The District Court did not err in relying on relevant testimony presented at earlier hearings and incorporating earlier findings based on evidence presented at those hearings. The court correctly considered that the circumstances related to the prior termination were ongoing and relevant to the parents' ability to adequately care for A.H.D. Thus, the District Court did not abuse its discretion in terminating the parents' rights to A.H.D. In re A.H.D., 2008 MT 57, 341 M 494, 178 P3d 131 (2008).

Constitutionality of Procedures Allowing Consideration of Prior Termination of Parental Rights to Sibling: A mother asserted that procedures for terminating her parental rights violated due process, particularly when the District Court considered the prior involuntary termination of the mother's rights to A.P.'s sibling when it terminated her rights to A.P. The Supreme Court noted that because it is a fundamental liberty interest, a parent's right to the care and custody of a child must be protected by fundamentally fair procedures that ensure that the parent is not placed at an unfair disadvantage during termination proceedings. In this case, consideration of the prior termination of the mother's rights to a sibling did not violate due process. The District Court is not required to terminate, but rather the court has discretion to grant or deny the state's termination petition if the state proves the statutory elements, nor is the decision limited to the facts of the prior termination because the court also considers any available evidence relating to present family circumstances and the specific child at issue. The parent is also provided an opportunity to challenge the termination petition, and the burden of proof is on the state without placing the parent at an unfair disadvantage. The Supreme Court determined that the procedure allowing consideration of a prior termination does not violate a parent's due process rights. In re Custody & Parental Rights of A.P., 2007 MT 297, 340 M 39, 172 P3d 105 (2007).

Prior Involuntary Termination of Parental Rights to Sibling as Circumstance for Termination of Parental Rights: The involuntary termination of parental rights to a child's sibling constitutes one circumstance that a District Court may consider in terminating parental rights, as long as the circumstances related to the termination are relevant to the parent's ability to adequately care for the child at issue. The circumstances of a prior termination continue to be relevant in a later termination of a sibling unless the circumstances have changed. In this case, the District Court afforded a mother an opportunity to demonstrate that her circumstances had changed since her rights to her child's sibling were previously terminated, but the mother offered no evidence of changed circumstances, so the District Court did not err in terminating the mother's parental rights to the second child. In re Custody & Parental Rights of A.P., 2007 MT 297, 340 M 39, 172 P3d 105 (2007).

Failure to Apply Proper Statutory Criteria in Termination Proceedings — Reversible Error: Instead of applying the statutory criteria in this section when considering whether to terminate a mother's parental rights, the District Court relied on the legal presumption in 41-3-604 that because the children had been in foster care for 15 of the prior 22 months, termination was appropriate. The Supreme Court reversed. A parent's right to the care and custody of a child is a fundamental liberty interest that must be protected by fundamentally fair procedures. The legal presumption in 41-3-604 alone is not a sufficient basis to terminate parental rights and neither eliminates the substantive requirements in this section nor diminishes the clear and convincing burden of proof on the party seeking to terminate parental rights. By relying on the presumption in 41-3-604, the District Court impermissibly shifted the burden of proof to the mother by concluding that there was insufficient evidence to rebut the presumption. It was not the mother's duty to rebut the presumption, but rather the state's burden to show that the mother failed to complete a treatment plan and that the mother's conduct or condition was unlikely to change within a reasonable time. Because the District Court applied the wrong statutory standards, the order terminating parental rights was reversed and the case was remanded for application of the proper statutory criteria. In re D.B. & D.B., 2007 MT 246, 339 M 240, 168 P3d 691 (2007).

Parent's Prior Conviction of Sexual Offense Properly Applied in Parental Rights Termination Proceeding — No Retroactive Statutory Application: During proceedings to terminate a father's parental rights, the state became aware of the father's prior 1985 conviction in Texas of a sexual offense involving a minor. The District Court held that the prior conviction was an aggravating circumstance under 41-3-423 for purposes of terminating the father's parental rights pursuant to this section. On appeal, the father argued that the court improperly applied the 1999 amendments to 41-3-423 and this section retroactively to a criminal act that occurred at least 13 years prior to enactment of the amendments, in violation of the father's vested constitutional parental rights. Setting out the conditions of retroactivity, the Supreme Court noted that a statute does not operate retroactively merely because it is applied to conduct that occurs prior to the statute's enactment and that an amended statute that is applied to a factual situation that occurred prior to amendment is not viewed as retroactive in application. In this case, no additional sanction was imposed on the prior conviction by enactment of the new statutory provisions, but the prior conviction was made a condition for the termination of parental rights in the event that the children were subsequently neglected or abused. Moreover, the prior conviction did not require or inevitably lead to the children being abused or neglected, necessitating the filing of an abuse and neglect petition. Rather, the prior conviction became relevant as an independent ground for the state to petition for termination of parental rights only after the children were abused and neglected. Additionally, the statutes went into effect in 1999, and the termination proceeding was initiated in 2003, so the father was on notice that the prior conviction could be used as an aggravating circumstance to justify termination if the father allowed the children to be abused and neglected. Therefore, applying the 1999 versions of 41-3-423 and this section to a conviction that occurred prior to 1999 did not constitute an unlawful retroactive application of the statutes. In re. M.A.L., D.L., & T.L., 2006 MT 299, 334 M 436, 148 P3d 606 (2006).

Parent's Excited Utterance Following Domestic Disturbance Not Considered Hearsay in Proceeding Adjudicating Child as Youth in Need of Care: In adjudicating a child as a youth in need of care, the District Court relied on statements made by the mother to an officer who was investigating a domestic disturbance at the family residence. Following adjudication, the court implemented a treatment plan, which the father refused to sign. The court subsequently terminated the father's parental rights for failing to comply with the treatment plan. The father contended that the District Court improperly admitted hearsay evidence from the officer that provided the evidentiary support for designating the child as a youth in need of care. The Supreme Court disagreed. The excited utterance exception to the hearsay rule under Rule 803, M.R.Ev. (Title 26, ch. 10), applied to the officer's testimony regarding the mother's statements because the statements were made immediately after the mother had been fighting with the father and while she was still visibly upset. Thus, the District Court did not abuse its discretion in allowing the officer's testimony. In re T.W. & J.M., 2006 MT 153, 332 M 454, 139 P3d 810 (2006), distinguishing In re Marriage of Bonamarte, 263 M 170, 866 P2d 1132 (1994).

Action of Recused Judge in Temporary Child Custody Proceedings Affirmed: A District Court Judge signed an order recusing himself from parental rights termination proceedings, but subsequently presided over an emergency temporary custody and protective services proceeding before the recusal order was filed. The parties questioned when the recusal was effective and whether it affected the validity of the emergency proceeding. The Supreme Court concluded that the recusal question did not affect the disposition of the case because, regardless of when the order became effective, the emergency hearing did not affect the child's permanent legal custody or the parent's rights. Thus, the judge's action in conducting the hearing after recusing himself did not warrant reversal in light of the fundamentally fair procedures afforded in the subsequent youth adjudication and parental rights termination proceedings. In re A.N.W., 2006 MT 42, 331 M 208, 130 P3d 619 (2006).

No Error in Consideration of Evidence of Parole Status Following Termination Hearing: A father contended that it was error for the District Court to consider evidence of his parole status in Wisconsin after the father's parental rights termination hearing had concluded in Montana. The Supreme Court found no prejudicial error because the written report simply verified the same information that the father's parole officer presented in person at the termination hearing. In re A.N.W., 2006 MT 42, 331 M 208, 130 P3d 619 (2006).

Failure to Appear at Parental Rights Termination Hearing and to Object to Termination — Waiver of Right to Appeal: A father appealed the termination of his parental rights on grounds that the District Court relied on evidence in the extensive record rather than live testimony at the termination hearing. However, to properly preserve an issue for appeal, a party must notify the trial court at the time that the objectionable conduct is at issue, and untimely objections may not be heard on appeal. The father failed to appear at the termination hearing and thus waived the right to testify, nor did the father's attorney object to termination, having had no contact with the father prior to the hearing. By failing to appear or to object in person or by counsel, the father waived the right to appeal the manner in which the hearing was conducted, including the District Court's decision to rely on the record rather than take live testimony. Termination was affirmed. In re A.T., 2006 MT 35, 331 M 155, 130 P3d 1249 (2006), following In re Parenting of K.P., 2005 MT 297, 329 M 337, 124 P3d 1091 (2005), and distinguishing In re M.O., 2003 MT 4, 314 M 13, 62 P3d 265 (2003).

No Due Process Violations in Parental Rights Termination Proceeding — Statutory Mandates Addressed: A mother asserted that her due process rights were violated in a parental rights termination proceeding because: (1) the state failed to make reasonable efforts to reunify mother and child as required in 41-3-423; (2) the District Court, in effect, terminated her right while purporting only to grant a planned permanent living arrangement and permanent care and control of the child to the state in violation of this section; (3) the state failed to petition the District Court for termination in a timely fashion in violation of 41-3-604; and (4) the District Court failed to hold a permanency plan hearing in a timely manner in violation of 41-3-445. The Supreme Court considered each claim and affirmed. Although reunification efforts failed, the state's efforts were reasonable and in compliance with the governing statutes. The mother's parental rights were severely limited, but not actually terminated, so her argument regarding improper termination procedures failed. The state does not have to petition to terminate parental rights if a compelling reason has been documented for determining that filing a petition would not be in the child's best interests. In this case, there was such a compelling reason—namely, that the state had tried to reunify mother and child for years and did not seek termination casually. The tardy permanency hearing argument also failed in light of the state's diligent, although unsuccessful, efforts to create a permanent and stable environment for the child in an effort to ensure that the child did not languish in foster care. Preservation and Reunification Efforts Not Required in Involuntary Termination of Parental Rights: If a court involuntarily terminates a parent's rights under this section, the state may forego reasonable efforts to provide preservation or reunification services to that parent with regard to any future children placed with the state, pursuant to 41-3-423. Voluntary relinquishment is only one of several criteria that a court may consider when ordering termination of parental rights. In this case, the District Court properly terminated a mother's parental rights based in part on adjudication of the child as a youth in need of care. With the exception of minor immaterial misstatements, the court's decision was based on facts supported by substantial testimonial evidence from professionals, so termination of parental rights was not an abuse of discretion, and the decision was affirmed. In re P.S., 2006 MT 4, 330 M 239, 127 P3d 451 (2006).

No Improper Bifurcation of Adjudicatory and Dispositional Hearings Based on Noticed Testimony From Earlier Show Cause Hearing: A parent argued that adjudicatory and dispositional hearings were improperly bifurcated because the District Court took notice of and improperly relied upon expert testimony offered at an earlier show cause hearing. The state argued that a court may take notice of the records of any court in the state. The Supreme Court noted that the District Court allowed the parent to move for reconsideration at the hearing of its judicial notice of testimony from the previous hearing, but the parent did not move for reconsideration. Because the District Court also determined that there was sufficient evidence at the later hearing, without reliance on the noticed testimony, to sustain a finding of abuse and neglect and because the parent did not establish that use of the noticed testimony was a disadvantage, no error was demonstrated. In re S.C. & L.Z., 2005 MT 241, 328 M 476, 121 P3d 552 (2005).

Protective Order Against Parent's Discovery Requests Not Abuse of Discretion Given Department's Open File Policy: In a termination of parental rights case, the District Court granted the state's motion for a protective order against a parent's discovery requests for admission, interrogatories, and requests for production, and the parent appealed. The Supreme Court cautioned that parties to termination proceedings have the full right to discover the case against them. However, in this case, the District Court did not abuse its discretion in granting the protective order because the state and the county maintained an open file policy that allowed the parent access to the entire file for inspection and copying and because the District Court ruled that any evidence or witness offered at trial that was not disclosed by review of the file might be excluded upon objection. Because the parent could not demonstrate prejudice, granting of the protective order was affirmed. In re S.C. & L.Z., 2005 MT 241, 328 M 476, 121 P3d 552 (2005).

Lack of Counsel — No Due Process Violation Following Termination of Parental Rights: A mother's parental rights were terminated in 2001, after which her counsel withdrew and the District Court appointed a public defender without notifying the defender. The mother contended that her due process rights were violated because she did not have adequate representation once her counsel withdrew. The Supreme Court recognized that due process and fundamental fairness require that a parent be represented by counsel at proceedings to terminate parental rights and that the mother had counsel during the termination proceedings and on direct appeal. The mother failed to establish that the proceedings did not comport with relevant statutory and constitutional due process requirements, and her argument was without merit. Termination of her parental rights was affirmed. In re T.H. & C.D.F., 2005 MT 237, 328 M 428, 121 P3d 541 (2005), following In re A.S., 2004 MT 62, 320 M 268, 87 P3d 408 (2004).

Time Limit for Appeal of Termination of Parental Rights Running From Service of Notice of Entry of Judgment — Laches Inapplicable: The District Court determined that a mother abandoned her children and terminated the mother's parental rights; however, the mother was never served with notice of entry of judgment regarding the termination. The mother moved to vacate or void the order and requested a hearing on the termination, but the motion was denied. The state contended that further consideration of the issue was barred by 42-2-620 or by laches. The Supreme Court disagreed that the mother's appeal was barred by 42-2-620 because the statute does not alter the filing period for timely appeals but merely sets a 6-month time limit on all other challenges to orders terminating parental rights. Rather, former Rule 77(d), M.R.Civ.P. (now superseded), applied. The rule requires service of notice of entry of judgment, and former Rule 5, M.R.App.P. (now superseded), provided that the 60-day time limit for appeals does not apply until service of notice of entry of judgment, but the mother was never served. The equitable doctrine of laches also did not apply because the state failed to discharge its simple affirmative duty to notify the mother of entry of judgment. Thus, the mother's appeal was timely. In re T.H. & C.D.F., 2005 MT 237, 328 M 428, 121 P3d 541 (2005), clarifying In re P.D.L., 2004 MT 346, 324 M 327, 102 P3d 1225 (2004).

No Requirement to Reopen Testimony or Continue Hearing Upon Parent's Failure to Appear: A mother failed to appear for the final day of a hearing on termination of her parental rights. On appeal, the mother contended that it was fundamentally unfair for the trial court to refuse to reopen the case to allow her testimony or to continue the trial. The Supreme Court disagreed. The mother was represented by counsel and was properly notified of the petition to terminate and the hearing. Any prejudice to the mother arose from her failure to appear. There is no requirement that a termination hearing be continued indefinitely until a parent decides to show up. The District Court's refusal to reopen or continue the hearing was therefore not fundamentally unfair. In re A.A. & D.A., 2005 MT 119, 327 M 127, 112 P3d 993 (2005).

Failure of District Court to Determine Indian Status of Children Prior to Termination of Parental Rights Warranting Reversal: Absent a conclusive determination from the affected tribes, it was reversible error for the District Court to terminate a mother's parental rights without definitely resolving the threshold question of whether the children were Indian children within the meaning of the Indian Child Welfare Act. In this case, the District Court was presented with insufficient evidence regarding the children's status because of the mother's failure to present crucial evidence regarding the children's possible tribal affiliation and the tribe's delay in intervening. However, the tribe's right to intervene was not impaired by the delay, and the court should not have proceeded absent a conclusive determination that the children were not tribal members. In re A.G., W.G., T.A., & J.A., 2005 MT 81, 326 M 403, 109 P3d 756 (2005).

Finding That Child Adjudicated Youth in Need of Care Required for Termination: A mother contended that the District Court erred in a termination proceeding by not making a finding that her child was a youth in need of care. However, this section does not require a District Court in a termination proceeding to find by clear and convincing evidence that the child is a youth in need of care, but rather to find that the child has been adjudicated as a youth in need of care. In this case, that finding was made at a prior temporary custody hearing, and the District Court did not err by failing to revisit the question at the termination hearing. In re V.F.A., 2005 MT 76, 326 M 383, 109 P3d 749 (2005).

Standards Applicable to Termination of Indian Parental Rights — Active Department Efforts to Provide Services Required: The District Court terminated the parental rights of an Indian father after the children were removed from the father's custody a fourth time because of the father's abuse and neglect. The father appealed on grounds that: (1) the state did not make active efforts to provide remedial services; (2) the District Court relied on expert testimony based on the Department file rather than personal interviews; and (3) it was error not to grant the father's request for an extension of temporary legal custody. The Supreme Court affirmed on all issues. The father left no phone number or address with the social worker and moved multiple times. Without any involvement, the father prevented the Department from making active efforts at providing more intensive services. Second, the federal Indian Child Welfare Act requires testimony from a qualified expert witness, but does not require a specific form of that testimonial evidence or personal interviews, and a District Court need not conform its decision to a particular piece of evidence or a particular expert's report or testimony as long as a reasonable person could have found beyond a reasonable doubt that continued custody by an Indian parent or custodian is likely to result in serious emotional or physical damage to the child. Last, the District Court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to extend temporary custody because the Department had already provided active efforts and did not need more time to assist the father in attaining his goals. The District Court had an accurate perspective on the father's parenting abilities, and refusal to extend the temporary placement did not make the court's decision any less reasonable. Misdiagnosis of Rare Skin Disease as Evidence of Parental Sexual Misconduct — Newly Acquired Evidence Did Not Undermine Validity of Adjudication of Children as Youths in Need of Care — Termination of Parental Rights Upheld: After the parents' 4-year-old daughter was diagnosed as a probable victim of parental sexual misconduct, the court ordered a TIA and protective services for all five children, who were all under 5 years of age. Both parents were criminally charged with abuse and neglect of their children. The father remained in jail for 1 year. The children were tested and found to be developmentally delayed in their speech, and both parents were diagnosed with psychological disorders. Both parents were ordered to complete treatment plans, which they failed to complete. Eventually, their parental rights were terminated. Two years after the initial diagnosis, it was determined that the daughter's physical symptoms were the result of a rare skin disease called lichens sclerosis et atrophicus (LSA) rather than sexual abuse. The parents appealed the termination of their parental rights and argued that the District Court had erred in adjudicating the children as youths in need of care based on the misdiagnosis. The parents further argued that the allegations of sexual molestation because of the misdiagnosis tainted the entire proceedings to such a degree that they were deprived of their rights to due process and fundamental fairness, thereby invalidating the subsequent termination ruling. The Supreme Court upheld the District Court and held that, based on the developmental delays and psychological disorders, the District Court had adequate grounds independent of the LSA misdiagnosis for adjudicating the children as youths in need of care under 41-3-422 and that the subsequent termination under this section was valid. In re D.B., 2004 MT 371, 325 M 13, 103 P3d 1026 (2004).

Adjudication Properly Based on Parents' Stipulation That Children Considered Youths in Need of Care: Following termination of their parental rights, the parents contended that termination was not proper because the children were never adjudicated as youths in need of care, which is the threshold for termination proceedings. Although there was no hearing at which that determination was made based on a preponderance of the evidence, under 41-3-434, a parent may stipulate that a child is a youth in need of care, and the parents in this case twice stipulated that their children were in need of care—once when they signed a stipulation to temporary legal custody and again when they signed a stipulation to the extension of temporary legal custody. Based on these stipulations and the holding in In Re Custody & Parental Rights of M.W. & C.S., 2001 MT 78, 305 M 80 (2001), the children were properly adjudicated as youths in need of care. In re M.B., J.B., & W.B., 2004 MT 304, 323 M 468, 100 P3d 1006 (2004).

Extension of Temporary Legal Custody — Failure to Extend Original Treatment Plan Deadlines Not Error: Following termination of their parental rights, the parents argued that because several deadlines in the original treatment plan had already passed when the District Court extended the Department's temporary legal custody of the children, the court erred when it did not also extend the deadlines in the original treatment plan. The Supreme Court disagreed. Consistent with the statutory preference for resolution of parenting problems and reunification of the family over termination of parental rights, the Department sought to extend temporary custody in order to allow the parents more time to complete their respective treatment plans. Further, the parents requested no extension of the deadlines when the extension was granted, the District Court considered all of the parents' efforts to complete their plans, not just those preceding the deadlines, and the parents failed to cite any authority that would oblige a District Court to modify a treatment plan when a parent has failed to meet its deadlines. In re M.B., J.B., & W.B., 2004 MT 304, 323 M 468, 100 P3d 1006 (2004).

Sufficient Evidence That ICWA Standards Met in Terminating Parental Rights — Termination Affirmed Absent Abuse of Discretion: An Indian father contended that the state did not present sufficient evidence under the federal Indian Child Welfare Act of 1978 (ICWA) to warrant termination of his parental rights. The Supreme Court determined that: (1) there was sufficient evidence that continued custody of the children was likely to result in serious emotional or physical damage to the children; (2) the evidence was supported by testimony from qualified experts; (3) active but unsuccessful efforts had been made to provide remedial services and rehabilitative programs to prevent the breakup of the Indian family; and (4) the children had lived in foster care a sufficient time to create the presumption under 41-3-604 that the children's best interests would be served by terminating parental rights. The ICWA requirements having been followed, parental rights were properly terminated. In re S.R., R.R., & G.R. Jr., 2004 MT 227, 322 M 424, 97 P3d 559 (2004).

Parent's Due Process Right to Effective Assistance of Counsel During Parental Rights Termination Proceedings: Because a parent's right to the custody and care of the parent's child is a fundamental liberty interest that must be protected by fundamentally fair procedures, a parent is entitled not only to assistance of counsel during parental rights termination proceedings, but also to effective assistance of counsel during those proceedings. The Supreme Court will evaluate effectiveness of counsel in parental rights termination cases by following the nonexclusive factors of training and experience and of advocacy. In the present case, a mother's counsel was not prepared to perform the duty to zealously advocate for the mother at a termination hearing, nor was advocacy beyond counsel's means, as demonstrated by the fact that counsel was prepared at a later hearing. However, because the mother did not suffer prejudice because of counsel's failure to provide effective assistance, termination of the mother's parental rights was affirmed. In re A.S., 2004 MT 62, 320 M 268, 87 P3d 408 (2004), followed in In re J.J.L., D.J.L., and R.D.L.L., 2010 MT 4, 355 Mont. 23, 223 P.3d 921, and In re A.J.W., 2010 MT 42, 355 Mont. 264, 227 P.3d 1012.

Failure to Hold Parental Permanency Plan Hearing Within Statutory Time Not Violative of Due Process: A mother whose parental rights were terminated contended that the failure to hold a permanency hearing within the time enumerated in 41-3-445, the length of the proceeding, and the denial of her request to allow her counselor to videotape her visits with her children violated her due process rights. The Supreme Court examined the case for fundamental fairness and affirmed. Under 41-3-445, a permanency hearing is not required if a child has been returned to a biological parent, and in this case, the children were returned to the custody of their biological father. The court did not condone the failure to hold a timely hearing as required, but noted that in this case, there was an ongoing attempt to reunify the children with one of the parents, which was the goal of the permanency plan, so the goal was accomplished without a hearing. As to the issue of length of proceedings, the court noted that despite the failure of the mother to show progress toward reunification goals, after 15 months, the Department was still actively working with her to accomplish the goal and did not seek termination until more than 20 months after the children were removed from the home, so the length of time did not prejudice the mother's rights. Moreover, the request for presence of the mother's counselor during visits was never actually denied by the District Court because the mother had no visitation rights at the time of the request that could have been denied. In re A.R. & S.A.R., 2004 MT 22, 319 M 340, 83 P3d 1287 (2004).

Letter From Tribe Conclusive as to Tribal Membership of Children in Parental Termination Proceeding: During parental termination proceedings, a question arose as to whether two of the children involved might be Indian children by virtue of their father's tribal membership. In order to comply with the Indian Child Welfare Act of 1978 (ICWA), the state contacted the tribe to determine if the children were tribal members. The tribe responded by letter and stated that the children were not tribal members and were not eligible for membership based on blood quantum. Under In re Adoption of Riffle, 277 M 388, 922 P2d 510 (1996), the tribe's determination was conclusive, but even aside from the letter, testimony from the children's father and several social workers affirmed that the children were not eligible for tribal membership. Because the children could not be considered Indian children by definition, the ICWA did not apply to the termination proceedings. In re T.J.H., J.H., J.L., & A.L., 2003 MT 352, 318 M 528, 81 P3d 504 (2003). See also In re C.H., S.H., & D.H., 2003 MT 308, 318 M 208, 79 P3d 822 (2003).

Belated Notice of Possible Indian Heritage of Child Subject to State Parental Termination Proceedings — Notice to Tribe Required to Allow Future Tribal Involvement if Appropriate: Only after parental termination proceedings were completed did the mother raise the issue of the possible Indian heritage of one of her children and the possible applicability of the Indian Child Welfare Act of 1978 (ICWA). One purpose of ICWA is to afford tribes the opportunity to intervene by providing a tribe with notice before proceedings begin; but in this case, that purpose could not be honored because the District Court did not know or have reason to know of the child's possible heritage until after the termination hearing had concluded. Faced with a silent record and because the issue was not raised in the trial court, the Supreme Court declined to undermine the entire termination proceeding, but the court did order that notice be given to the tribe of which the child might be a member so that the tribe could intervene in any future proceedings if it was determined that the child was indeed an Indian child. In re C.H., S.H., & D.H., 2003 MT 308, 318 M 208, 79 P3d 822 (2003).

Indian Child Welfare Act Inapplicable to Child Ineligible for Membership in Federally Unrecognized Tribe: The state sought to terminate a mother's parental rights, but the mother contended that the Indian Child Welfare Act of 1978 (ICWA) should apply because the father of the child was an enrolled member of the Little Shell Band of Chippewa. The Supreme Court held that ICWA did not apply for two reasons: (1) the father qualified for membership in the Little Shell Band based on the minimum one-quarter blood quantum, but the child, having only one-eighth blood quantum, did not qualify for enrollment, and tribal membership of an Indian child is required for ICWA to apply; and (2) ICWA applies only to federally recognized tribes, and as of the date of the proceeding, the Little Shell Band of Chippewa was not recognized by the U.S. Secretary of the Interior as eligible to receive services. In re C.H., S.H., & D.H., 2003 MT 308, 318 M 208, 79 P3d 822 (2003).

Failure to Adjudicate Youth in Need of Care Precluding Termination of Parental Rights: A parent contended that parental rights were improperly terminated because the child was not properly adjudicated as a youth in need of care. The Supreme Court noted that such adjudication is a threshold requirement before a court may grant temporary legal custody, order a parental treatment plan, or terminate parental rights. The state argued that the child was found to be a youth in need of care during earlier guardianship proceedings in a different District Court. The Supreme Court cited In re F.M., 2002 MT 180, 311 M 35, 53 P3d 368 (2002), for the holding that evidence received at a hearing on a collateral matter, such as a guardianship proceeding, did not satisfy the adjudicatory requirements of 41-3-404 (renumbered 41-3-437). Further, it was improper for the District Court to approve a treatment plan 10 months prior to proper adjudication of the child as a youth in need of care, in violation of 41-3-406 (renumbered 41-3-438) and 41-3-420 (renumbered 41-3-443), which also rendered the requirements of this section unsatisfied. Because the child was not properly adjudicated a youth in need of care, court approval of a treatment plan was improper and termination of parental rights was reversed. In re B.N.Y., 2003 MT 241, 317 M 291, 77 P3d 189 (2003).

State's Reliance on Parent's Failure to Provide Treatment Plan Verification Not Considered Impermissible Shift of Burden of Proof to Parent: A mother's treatment plan required compliance with various goals and tasks. The state social worker who testified regarding the mother's compliance with the treatment plan stated that no verification was received regarding the mother's compliance with the various goals and tasks, and on that basis, the mother's parental rights were terminated. On appeal, the mother contended that the sole reliance on her failure to provide verification of compliance resulted in an impermissible shifting of the state's burden to her to prove compliance. The Supreme Court disagreed. The evidence at trial established that the mother failed to satisfy her affirmative obligations under the treatment plan, so the trial court did not erroneously impute the state's burden of proof to the mother or abuse its discretion in terminating her parental rights. In re A.T. & J.T., 2003 MT 154, 316 M 255, 70 P3d 1247 (2003).

Judicial Notice of Mother's Prior Termination Proceeding in Action to Terminate Father's Parental Rights — No Error: The District Court terminated a father's parental rights after taking judicial notice of the sealed record of the mother's prior termination proceeding. The father asserted error because the court took notice of facts that were not known and could not be discovered by the father. The Supreme Court disagreed. Rules 201 and 202, M.R.Ev. (Title 26, ch. 10), allow the District Court to take judicial notice of certain facts of record. Although sealed, the record was not entirely inaccessible because the father could have petitioned for disclosure of the records under 41-3-205, but he did not, even though he was aware of the prior proceeding. In re K.C.H., 2003 MT 125, 316 M 13, 68 P3d 788 (2003).

Expert Witness in Indian Child Welfare Proceeding — Cultural Knowledge of Particular Tribe Not Required: Federal law does not define "qualified expert witness" or provide criteria for determining whether a person is qualified to testify as an expert under the Indian Child Welfare Act of 1978 (ICWA), although federal guidelines do allow expert testimony of a professional person having substantial education and experience in the area of the professional's specialty. In the present case, the state called an expert who: (1) was a Blackfeet tribal member with knowledge of Blackfeet culture; (2) worked closely with Indian families while conducting home studies and writing reports relating to adoption and foster care placement of Indian children in Montana; (3) was a teacher in Minnesota and was exposed to the culture of other tribes; (4) worked for the state as a family resource specialist; and (5) was trained and certified by the state as a qualified ICWA expert witness. The father of the Indian youth in need of care objected that the state's witness was not qualified because the witness had no knowledge of the Confederated Tribes of Siletz Indians of Oregon. The objection was overruled, and the father appealed. The Supreme Court affirmed. It is not necessary that an expert witness in an ICWA case have knowledge of the cultural standards of a particular tribe. The determination of whether the witness is sufficiently qualified remains within the discretion of the trial court, and it was not an abuse of that discretion for the District Court to accept the state's witness in this case. In re M.R.G., 2003 MT 60, 314 M 396, 66 P3d 312 (2003), followed in In re K.S., D.S., & C.S., 2003 MT 212, 317 M 88, 75 P3d 325 (2003).

Failure to Hold Adjudicatory Hearing to Determine Whether Children in Need of Care — Termination of Parental Rights Improper Absent Adjudication of Status of Children: The District Court held several hearings concerning temporary investigative authority, granting several extensions, and also held several hearings concerning granting temporary legal custody, which was extended twice. The state then filed a petition to terminate the mother's parental rights. Temporary legal custody was extended a third time pending a hearing on the termination hearing. At the hearing, the mother's parental rights were terminated, and she appealed. The Supreme Court found that there had never been an adjudicatory hearing at which the District Court heard testimony or received evidence concerning whether the children were abused or neglected. The hearing for temporary legal custody did not equate to an adjudication by the court that the children were youths in need of care, even in light of an alleged stipulation by the mother to that effect. Absent an adjudicatory hearing and an adjudication that the children were youths in need of care, termination of parental rights was improper, and the order was reversed. In re M.O., M.O., & M.O., 2003 MT 4, 314 M 13, 62 P3d 265 (2003).

Termination of Parental Rights — Fundamental Fairness Issues Not Considered When Raised for First Time on Appeal: On appeal, the father raised numerous issues to support his claim that he was denied fundamental fairness in procedures resulting in the termination of his parental rights. However, by failing to raise the objections in District Court, the father failed to properly preserve the issues for appeal and waived the right to have the issues considered by the Supreme Court. A District Court cannot correct statutory deficiencies if those concerns are not brought to its attention during the course of the proceedings, and the court will not be faulted for failing to address issues not raised before it. The District Court properly considered the best interests of the children in this case, and termination of the father's parental rights was affirmed. Retention of Jurisdiction to Terminate Parental Rights — Findings of Abuse or Neglect in Temporary Legal Custody Stage Required: To retain jurisdiction to terminate parental rights under this section, a District Court must find by a preponderance of the evidence in the temporary legal custody stage under 41-3-437 that the child is abused or neglected. The adjudication of a child as a youth in need of care cannot be established based on evidence received at the hearing on permanent legal custody. In its termination order, the court must conclude that it did not exceed its jurisdiction at any time during the course of the proceedings. If the court does not make a proper finding of abuse and neglect under 41-3-437, it will have exceeded its jurisdiction in waiting to make that determination until terminating parental rights under this section. In the present case, the District Court did not specifically state, pursuant to 41-3-437, that the children were youths in need of care, but the evidence upon which the court based its order granting temporary legal custody clearly demonstrated that the children had suffered actual harm and that they were in danger of substantial risk of harm to their health and welfare. The Supreme Court declined to disturb the findings of abuse and neglect, based on the District Court's language in its order extending the state's investigative authority. Alleged Newly Discovered Evidence That Could Have Been Produced at Trial — Motion for New Parental Rights Termination Trial Properly Denied: The District Court denied a petition to terminate a mother's parental rights and ordered her child returned to her within 30 days. The guardian ad litem appealed, contending that the judgment should be set aside based on newly discovered evidence. The guardian ad litem presented the alleged newly discovered evidence through affidavits, contending that the mother left her apartment in poor condition with empty beer cans, was evicted, was fired twice from her employment, was seen driving a stolen vehicle, and had continued ongoing communication with the child's father. The District Court noted that this was one of the hardest fought and most lengthy parental rights termination trials in the court's experience and found it extremely unlikely that the alleged newly discovered evidence could not with reasonable diligence have been discovered and produced at trial. The District Court weighed the affidavit information and did not act arbitrarily or abuse its discretion in denying the motion to set aside the judgment based on newly discovered evidence. The District Court was affirmed. In re B.B., 2001 MT 285, 307 M 379, 37 P3d 715 (2001).

Objection to Medical Testimony Regarding Effects of Personality Disorder on Parenting Sustained — Cross-Examination Properly Limited: A medical expert who evaluated a mother regarding her parenting ability was asked about opinions that could be made based on the evaluation. The expert responded that it would require an explanation of personality and cognitive features and limitations. The guardian ad litem contended that inquiry should be allowed on cross-examination into the effects of a personality disorder on parenting. The mother objected, and the District Court sustained as beyond the scope of direct examination. The Supreme Court affirmed. The District Court did not abuse its discretion in limiting the latitude of cross-examination because the expert testimony in this case centered on the expert's observations and because the expert had not diagnosed the mother with a personality disorder. In re B.B., 2001 MT 285, 307 M 379, 37 P3d 715 (2001).

Failure to Appoint Counsel for Minor Parent During Formulation of and Prior to Court Approval of Treatment Plan Violative of Due Process Rights: H.C. was adjudicated a youth in need of care, and was simultaneously a minor parent in an abuse and neglect proceeding whose own child was adjudicated a youth in need of care. Although a guardian ad litem was appointed to represent H.C.'s child, counsel was never appointed for H.C. herself during the formulation of her treatment plan or prior to the District Court's approval of the plan. A natural parent's right to the care and custody of a child is a fundamental liberty interest that requires that the state provide a fundamentally fair procedure at all stages in proceedings for the termination of parental rights. Due process requires fundamental fairness, and fundamental fairness requires fair procedures. Further, under Art. II, sec. 15, Mont. Const., a minor parent is entitled to the same due process protections and procedures as adult counterparts. In this case, in order to preserve the fundamental fairness of the proceedings and for the treatment plan to be considered appropriate, due process required that counsel be appointed for the minor mother during the formulation of her treatment plan and prior to the District Court's approval of the plan, and the failure of the District Court to do so was reversible error. In re A.F.-C., 2001 MT 283, 307 M 358, 37 P3d 724 (2001), distinguishing In re T.C. & R.C., 240 M 308, 784 P2d 392 (1989), inasmuch as appointment of counsel is not always inappropriate or otherwise precluded during the earlier stages of child protective proceedings that precede termination proceedings, if due process requires.

Error in Allowing Amendment of Pleadings in Parental Rights Termination Case to Include New Theory — Lack of Notice Violative of Due Process Rights: During a parental rights termination hearing, the District Court allowed the state to amend the pleadings to include a new theory that the mother had abandoned her children. The mother's counsel objected for lack of notice. The state asserted that although abandonment may not have been included in the original pleadings as a separate ground for termination, there were facts in the original petition that supported a claim for abandonment and that the mother was thus on notice that the state intended to present evidence that would support a theory of abandonment. The Supreme Court disagreed. The fundamental liberty interest associated with parental rights must be protected with fundamentally fair procedures, including the due process requirement that a parent receive notice and be allowed the opportunity to be heard. Generally, a District Court cannot grant leave to amend the pleadings arbitrarily or perfunctorily, and although there are cases when the Supreme Court will allow a party to amend pleadings in order for a case to proceed efficiently on the merits, this was not one of those cases. The termination petition as a whole did not provide the mother with sufficient notice on the charge of abandonment. Although some of the facts may have been applicable to abandonment, the mother should not have been required to glean from those facts which claims the state could bring. Rather, the state was required to articulate the claims that it expected to raise, and allowing amendment of the pleadings during the hearing to include a theory of abandonment was reversible error. In re T.C. & W.C., 2001 MT 264, 307 M 244, 37 P3d 70 (2001), followed in In re C.J., 2010 MT 179, 357 Mont. 219, 237 P.3d 1282.

Failure to Adjudicate Child as Youth in Need of Care — Termination of Parental Rights Improper: A mother was arrested for a parole violation, and the state filed a petition to investigate whether her children were abused or neglected. The District Court granted the petition on a preliminary basis, and the children were placed in a foster home. The mother was released on bond but failed to appear for a show cause hearing. The state's petition was then granted, and the court found that it was in the children's best interests to be removed from the home. The mother was later arrested again, released the following day, and left for Florida, leaving the children behind. She was arrested in Florida about 3 months later, and while incarcerated there, Montana filed for approval of a treatment plan. The treatment plan was faxed to the mother, but she refused to sign it. The plan was approved without her signature. A district citizen review board then recommended that the mother's parental rights be terminated based on the mother's criminal history, the social history of the case, and the children's need for permanence. The District Court terminated the mother's parental rights for failing to comply with the treatment plan, and the mother appealed. The Supreme Court held that termination of parental rights was in error because the children had never been adjudicated as youths in need of care through an adjudicatory hearing, as required by 41-3-437. A stipulation by the mother to let the court give temporary custody of the children to the state did not constitute a stipulation or an adjudication that the children were youths in need of care. In re T.C. & W.C., 2001 MT 264, 307 M 244, 37 P3d 70 (2001).

No Error in Failure to Grant Continuance of Parental Rights Trial Absent Affidavits or Showing of Good Cause: The father contended that the District Court erred in failing to grant his motion for a continuance of the trial to terminate his parental rights because he had only 20 days to prepare for trial. Although true that only 20 days elapsed after the father received actual notice of the hearing, he was aware for more than 4 months of the state's intention to terminate his parental rights. Further, he offered no affidavits in support of his motion to continue, offered no evidence of what he would have presented had more time been available, and failed to show any good cause beyond the argument of fundamental unfairness. The District Court noted that this was not a new case and that the father had plenty of time to get witnesses to the hearing. The hearing did not spring upon the father unexpectedly, and denial of his motion to continue was not erroneous. In re R.F., 2001 MT 199, 306 M 270, 32 P3d 1257 (2001).

No Requirement That Parent's Counsel Receive and Approve Treatment Plan Prior to Submission to Court: Under this section, a District Court may approve a treatment plan without a parent's signature, and under former 41-3-420 (now 41-3-443), a treatment plan must include the parent's signature, unless the plan is ordered by the District Court. Thus, there is no requirement for parental approval prior to submitting a treatment plan to the District Court, and by implication, there is no requirement that a parent's counsel receive and approve a proposed treatment plan prior to submission to the court. In re R.F., 2001 MT 199, 306 M 270, 32 P3d 1257 (2001).

Trial Court Not Precluded From Finding of Fact Even Though Evidence Conflicts: A mother contended that the trial court erred in finding that she had not completed her treatment plan because the testimony presented by counselors and the case worker conflicted in regard to her therapeutic progress in the ability to parent. The Supreme Court noted that the differences in opinion and conflicting evidence among the counselors on whether the requisite progress had been made in therapy did not preclude the trial court's determination that clear and convincing evidence existed to support the finding of fact. The trial court was in the best position to judge the credibility of all the witnesses, and the court's finding was affirmed. In re M.F.B., D.A.B., M.S.B., & S.L.B., 2001 MT 136, 305 M 481, 29 P3d 480 (2001).

No Rule That One Parent Be Allowed to Participate in Hearing to Terminate Other Parent's Rights: The father claimed that he should have been present with counsel at two hearings that were held to terminate the parental rights of his child and that he should have been allowed to challenge the state's evidence regarding the child's permanency plan. Although the fundamental liberty interest in a parent's right to the care and custody of a child requires the state to provide a fundamentally fair procedure for the termination of a parent's rights, in this case, both hearings were held to consider termination of the mother's parental rights, not the father's. The Supreme Court declined to adopt a rule that one parent must be allowed to take part in a hearing to terminate the other parent's rights. Further, testimony at the hearings involved recommendations for the child's future custody, not the father's parenting capabilities, so the court was not required to allow the father to scrutinize and challenge the evidence and witnesses at the permanency hearings. In Re Custody & Parental Rights of M.W. & C.S., 2001 MT 78, 305 M 80, 23 P3d 206 (2001).

Rejection of Court-Appointed Counsel During Criminal Trial — No Requirement for Different Court-Appointed Counsel at Subsequent Hearing to Terminate Parental Rights: On the first day of his criminal trial, Jeremy rejected court-appointed counsel from the public defender's office and represented himself instead. He was convicted of deliberate homicide. Later, during hearings to terminate his parental rights, the court appointed the same public defenders to represent him. His parental rights were terminated, and he appealed on grounds that his right to counsel was violated. However, he provided no authority for the argument that his rejection of the attorneys during the criminal trial somehow required that the court find alternative counsel for later proceedings. Jeremy was entitled to counsel, but not to counsel of his choice, nor did the appointment of the same counsel for both parents in the parental rights proceedings create a conflict of interest in violation of the Rules of Professional Conduct, absent a showing that it resulted in prejudice or adverse impact to the rights of the parties. Jeremy presented no evidence or authority that the right to counsel was denied, and the termination of his parental rights was affirmed. In Re Custody & Parental Rights of M.W. & C.S., 2001 MT 78, 305 M 80, 23 P3d 206 (2001).

Stipulation Not Considered Sufficient Adjudication of Youth in Need of Care — Lack of Jurisdictional Prerequisite to Terminate Parental Rights: The mother entered into a stipulation with the state that her children were youths in need of care only upon several conditions: (1) her parental rights would remain intact; (2) the children would reside with their grandmother; (3) the Casey Family Program would manage the children's cases; (4) the mother would always have contact with the children even if the program was required to intervene between the mother and grandmother; and (5) at an appropriate time when the mother was ready, the program, the Department, and the mother would devise a treatment plan that would be completed by the mother in order to regain custody of the children. At a subsequent hearing, the Department proposed a permanency plan that involved removing the children from their grandmother. The mother contended that the proposal amounted to a failure to abide by the conditions of the stipulation, thereby voiding the conditional stipulation that the children were youths in need of care and precluding the District Court's authority to terminate her parental rights. The Supreme Court agreed. Although a stipulation may be an acceptable alternative to an adjudicatory hearing in many circumstances, the fundamental nature of the rights of a parent requires that the process by which a stipulation is drafted and signed needs to be closely scrutinized. In this case, the stipulation was drafted by the County Attorney and signed by the mother without the benefit of legal counsel and essentially allowed the court to determine that the youths were in need of care without a finding that they were abused or neglected and without a hearing as required by 41-3-402 (renumbered 41-3-427). The mother had conflicting feelings about the removal of the children from their grandmother's care and relied on her understanding from the stipulation that the Department would not remove the children or terminate her parental rights, so she did not complete her treatment plan. Only a few days after the initial hearing, she promptly began work toward completion of the treatment plan and had made significant progress, particularly considering the unexpected death of her mother, by the time of the next hearing. Despite the change in circumstances resulting from the death, the Department did not grant the mother any additional time to complete the treatment plan, nor did the Department offer any evidence that the mother had abused or neglected the children. Under the unique facts of this case, the Supreme Court held that the District Court incorrectly found that the stipulation sufficed as an adjudication that the children were youths in need of care. Without that adjudication, the District Court lacked the jurisdictional prerequisite to terminate the mother's parental rights, so the Supreme Court reversed. In Re Custody and Parental Rights of M.W. & C.S., 2001 MT 78, 305 M 80, 23 P3d 206 (2001).

Failure of Parent With Mental Disability to Raise Issue of Violation of Americans With Disabilities Act — Consideration of Issue Precluded on Appeal: Following termination of her parental rights, the mother appealed on grounds that the termination violated the federal Americans With Disabilities Act of 1990 (ADA), 42 U.S.C. 12101, et seq., because different standards were imposed upon her as a parent with a mental illness than standards imposed on other parents. Although a majority of appellate courts have ruled that the ADA does not provide a defense to a parental rights termination proceeding, the Montana Supreme Court has not addressed the issue and declined to do so in this case because the mother did not offer any testimony, evidence, or argument at any of the various proceedings prior to appeal that would support the legal conclusion regarding her ADA defense. The mother's belated allusion to a possible ADA defense in her posthearing proposed conclusions of law was untimely and did not preserve the issue for appeal. In re A.M., 2001 MT 60, 304 M 379, 22 P3d 185 (2001). See also Nason v. Leistiko, 1998 MT 217, 290 M 460, 963 P2d 1279 (1998).

Finding That Child Is Youth in Need of Care Prerequisite to Transfer of Custody: The exigent protection of the health and welfare of a child is paramount when the state's initial intervention into otherwise private family matters reveals an actual or potentially dangerous or unhealthy environment requiring the removal of the child from a custodial caregiver. The legal determination that a child is a youth in need of care is a jurisdictional prerequisite for a court-ordered transfer of custody. The first question in a termination proceeding is whether the District Court correctly adjudicated the child as a youth in need of care, and the state need only offer clear and convincing evidence that the court properly adjudicated the child as a youth in need of care in order for the court to inquire into the actual fitness of the parent. In re A.M., 2001 MT 60, 304 M 379, 22 P3d 185 (2001).

Parent Not Represented by Counsel During Show Cause Hearing Regarding Whether Child a Youth in Need of Care — Due Process Rights Not Violated: At the time of a show cause hearing on whether her child was a youth in need of care, the mother was an indigent mental patient civilly committed to the state hospital. She appeared at the hearing without representation of counsel. The mother contended that the District Court violated her due process rights by making that critical determination regarding the child when she was unrepresented. Although in In re A.S.A., J.L.A., G.A., & A.J.A., 258 M 194, 852 P2d 127 (1993), the Supreme Court held that the constitutional right to due process guarantees an indigent parent the right to court-appointed counsel in parental rights termination proceedings, the court has not extended the right to counsel to a pretermination proceeding in which the focal issue is whether a child is a youth in need of care. Rather, appointment of counsel at any time prior to the initiation of termination proceedings is within the discretion of the District Court. In this case, the initial determination that the child was a youth in need of care was made by order pursuant to a finding of probable cause even before the mother's first appearance in any proceedings when the District Court relied on a report submitted by a social worker showing that the child was abused or neglected or in danger of abuse or neglect and that removal from the home was necessary to protect the child's welfare. Subsequent to the initial determination, the District Court reached the same conclusion on at least three separate occasions when the mother was represented by counsel, including one hearing when the social worker was subjected to cross-examination by the mother's counsel. The Supreme Court applied In re M.F., 201 M 277, 653 P2d 1205 (1982), and in re D.S., H.S., R.S., R.S., J.S., R.S., & K.S., 253 M 484, 833 P2d 1090 (1992), and in holding that the state is not required to provide counsel at proceedings concerning temporary investigative authority or temporary custody. Thus, the mother's due process rights were not violated when the District Court made the determination that the child was a youth in need of care at a time when the mother was not represented by counsel. In re A.M., 2001 MT 60, 304 M 379, 22 P3d 185 (2001).

Petition for Long-Term Custody Included With Petition for Termination of Parental Rights — No Requirement for Filing Subsequent to Hearing: The state petitioned to terminate the mother's parental rights or, alternatively, to grant long-term custody to the state with the right to assign guardianship to the children's grandmother. Because the District Court combined the permanency hearing with the termination hearing, the petition for long-term legal custody was not filed subsequent to the hearing, which the mother contended violated 41-3-412 (renumbered 41-3-445) and erroneously denied her sufficient notice. However, 41-3-412 (renumbered 41-3-445) does not require that a petition for long-term custody be filed subsequent to a hearing. That petition may be filed at the same time as a petition to terminate parental rights, and this alternative petition provides a parent with adequate notice of issues to be raised at the hearing. Thus, the court did not err in awarding long-term custody without requiring a separate petition limited to that issue. In re Custody & Parental Rights of T.Z. & J.Z., 2000 MT 205, 300 M 522, 6 P3d 960, 57 St. Rep. 806 (2000).

Hearsay Statements of Child Improperly Admitted in Parental Rights Termination Case — Harmless Error: The District Court improperly admitted hearsay evidence related by the child of parents who were subject to a parental rights termination case. However, the improper hearsay was not necessary to the court's determination of proved abuse or neglect of the fitness of the parents and thus did not affect the parents' substantial rights or the result that the court reached. Although the court abused its discretion in admitting the testimony, the error was harmless, and termination of parental rights was affirmed on appeal. In re A.N. & C.N., 2000 MT 35, 298 M 237, 995 P2d 427, 57 St. Rep. 155 (2000).

Consideration of Nonstatutory Options Not Required Prior to Termination of Parental Rights: Specific criteria for which a court may order termination of the parent-child legal relationship are enumerated in this section. There is no limitation placed upon a court that requires consideration of other options, such as a guardianship, prior to the termination of parental rights. In re E.A.T. & T.A.T., 1999 MT 281, 296 M 535, 989 P2d 860, 56 St. Rep. 1133 (1999).

Probable Cause That Child Abused or Neglected Not Adjudication of Youth in Need of Care: The father appealed the termination of his parental rights, arguing that the lower court erred in holding that it could terminate his rights based on an earlier adjudication that the child was a youth in need of care. The Supreme Court agreed, ruling that in the earlier hearing, the District Court's finding that there was probable cause to believe that the child was abused or neglected did not constitute an adjudication that the child was a youth in need of care. The Supreme Court upheld the termination on other grounds. In re M.J.W., 1998 MT 142, 289 M 232, 961 P2d 105, 55 St. Rep. 563 (1998).

Argument of Denial of Due Process to Be Raised at Trial: On appeal, Ison argued that her due process rights had been violated in that she was not able to cross-examine a psychologist ordered by the court to complete a posthearing evaluation. The Supreme Court ruled that Ison had not raised her due process argument at the trial court level and in fact only objected to the individual picked to perform the evaluation. In re R.B.O., 277 M 272, 921 P2d 268, 53 St. Rep. 640 (1996).

Reliance on Nonexistent Testimony — Findings of Fact Not Reversed: The Department of Family Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) moved to terminate the parental rights of M.C. after a long history of both M.C.'s mental illness and her daughter being placed in foster care. The District Court terminated M.C.'s parental rights, basing one of its findings upon the answer to a question concerning M.C.'s mental health that was never given by a social worker before the District Court. The Supreme Court found that there was other evidence before the District Court that M.C.'s mental health was not going to change within a reasonable time, and because the result of a reversal of the District Court's ruling would not ultimately change that ruling, the Supreme Court held that the reliance upon nonexistent testimony was harmless error. In re S.C., 264 M 24, 869 P2d 266, 51 St. Rep. 129 (1994).

No Reliance on Alford Plea in Terminating Parental Rights: Cameron pleaded guilty under an Alford plea to two counts of felony sexual assault, then later claimed that the District Court improperly relied on the plea to terminate his parental rights. The Supreme Court found that the nature of Cameron's plea was irrelevant to the termination of his parental rights because even though he pleaded guilty, the District Court had considered only Cameron's incarceration, the length of his prison sentence, and his refusal to complete sex offender treatment. In re Custody & Parental Rights of M.D., 262 M 183, 864 P2d 783, 50 St. Rep. 1505 (1993).

Child as Witness — Testimony Properly Excluded: In proceedings to terminate a father's parental rights, the District Court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to have a child testify as to custody when the threatened harm to the child outweighed any possible relevance the testimony would have. In re M.A.W. & K.M.W., 256 M 296, 846 P2d 985, 50 St. Rep. 64 (1993).

Motion to Rescind Untimely: A motion to rescind the order terminating parental rights, made nearly 6 months after appellant learned the termination order was entered, was untimely. In re A.E., C.E., S.R., & J.R., 255 M 56, 840 P2d 572, 49 St. Rep. 877 (1992).

Court Not to Take Judicial Notice of Hearing at Which Parties Not Present or Represented by Counsel: The Streckerts were not present or represented at a hearing by the lower court determining temporary custody of their children. Subsequently, during a hearing terminating parental rights, the District Court took judicial notice of the testimony presented during the temporary custody hearing. The Supreme Court held that the lower court should not have taken judicial notice of evidence presented in the first hearing but refused to reverse the decision on the basis that there was substantial other evidence to support the lower court's ruling. In re D.S., H.S., R.S., R.S., J.S., R.S., & K.S., 253 M 484, 833 P2d 1090, 49 St. Rep. 552 (1992).

Grant of Long-Term Custody Proper — Finding of Abuse and Neglect: Upon motion by the state to terminate parental rights, the District Court ordered that the "parental custodial rights of [mother, father, and stepfather] in and to the youths [B.N. and T.N.], and to their property, are hereby terminated". Under the authority of 41-3-406 (renumbered 41-3-438), the court then awarded permanent legal custody to the Department of Family Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) and gave the Department the right to place the children in foster care. The court also awarded supervised visitation rights to the parents and grandparents—an award inconsistent with termination of parental rights. The record clearly showed that neither the state nor the court intended to fully sever parental rights, even though the order used the words "terminated" and "permanent custody". On appeal, the Supreme Court found that the District Court intended to grant the state long-term custody, substantiated by a 10-year history of family turmoil resulting in abuse and neglect of the children, and that placement of the children in foster care was appropriate. In re B.N. & T.N., 245 M 511, 802 P2d 1244, 47 St. Rep. 2225 (1990).

Unclear Findings Not Grounds for Reversal: The mother appealed the termination of her parental rights on the basis that the lower court had never ordered a complete treatment plan for her prior to the termination. The Supreme Court stated that although it was unclear from the findings whether the lower court had found that there had been a treatment plan that was unsuccessful or whether the court had terminated the mother's rights on the basis that she was incarcerated, no grounds for reversal existed. The Supreme Court found that there was sufficient evidence to terminate the mother's parental rights under this section. In re B.H.M., C.M.M., & J.T.H., 245 M 179, 799 P2d 1090, 47 St. Rep. 1967 (1990).

Long-Term Incarceration Unconfirmed by Appellate Review — No Abuse of Discretion: A father whose parental rights were terminated while he was serving a lengthy prison term for aggravated assault of the child argued that the trial court, in the termination proceeding, could not rely upon a criminal conviction and sentence of imprisonment unconfirmed by appellate review. There is no authority for this proposition, and therefore the trial court did not abuse its discretion in severing his parental rights. In re A.B., 239 M 344, 780 P2d 622, 46 St. Rep. 1734 (1989).

No Right to Effective Assistance of Counsel at Termination Hearing — "Fundamental Fairness" Standard: There is no authority for the contention that a parent is entitled to effective assistance of counsel in a termination hearing so long as the procedure followed by the court is fundamentally fair. In re R.T.L.P., 238 M 384, 777 P2d 892, 46 St. Rep. 1354 (1989).

Due Process Properly Afforded Noncustodial Parent: Noncustodial father argued he was not afforded adequate due process in the termination of his parental rights. Although he was not properly notified of the first proceeding in which mother's and "unknown father's" rights were terminated, the District Court rectified the situation by reinstating father's rights, giving him proper notice of a second proceeding, and appointing counsel. Father personally appeared at all subsequent hearings with counsel. This notice and opportunity to appear constituted adequate procedural due process, and termination was proper. In re M.W., 234 M 530, 764 P2d 1279, 45 St. Rep. 2107 (1988).

Termination of Parental Rights Without Treatment Plan — Impossibility Required: After a hearing on the state's petition for temporary custody of C.L.R., the District Court amended the petition pursuant to 41-3-401 (renumbered 41-3-422) and terminated the father's parental rights. At the time of C.L.R.'s birth, both natural parents were incarcerated on convictions resulting from the death of C.L.R.'s half-brother. The father contended that the court erred in terminating his parental rights without following this section properly. He argued that the statute specifically requires establishment of a treatment plan prior to termination. The District Court set forth extensive findings and conclusions prior to determining that C.L.R. would not receive even minimally satisfactory care and would be exposed to extremely high chances of neglect, abuse, and even death if the father were ever allowed to care for the child. The Supreme Court held that the District Court had acted properly in terminating the father's parental rights, but it further stated that a termination of parental rights without first establishing a treatment plan would be allowed only when the facts clearly proved the impossibility of any workable plan. In re C.L.R., 211 M 381, 685 P2d 926, 41 St. Rep. 1436 (1984), followed in In re Custody & Parental Rights of M.D., 262 M 183, 864 P2d 783, 50 St. Rep. 1505 (1993). (Annotator's note: Chapter 388, sec. 3, L. 1985, amended 41-3-609(3) to provide that a treatment plan is not required if "the parent is incarcerated for more than 1 year and such treatment plan is not practical" or if "the death of a sibling caused by abuse or neglect by the parent has occurred".)

Federal Indian Child Welfare Act — Violation of Treatment Plan: A year or more after temporary custody of Indian child was granted the state in proceedings that may not have complied with the federal Indian Child Welfare Act (25 U.S.C. §§1901, et seq.), a treatment plan was prepared and approved by the court. The treatment plan was neither suggested nor required by the temporary custody order. In a termination proceeding complying with the Act, it was not error for the District Court to rely on the failure of the parents to comply with the treatment plan. In re M.E.M., 209 M 192, 679 P2d 1241, 41 St. Rep. 636 (1984).

Conditions Existing Prior to Neglect Adjudication — Unnecessary to Prove Continued Existence: District Court could properly base its decision to terminate parental rights on events occurring before the adjudication that child was neglected and was not required to base its decision on a showing by the State that the circumstances and conditions predating the adjudication continued to exist at the time of the decision, where the State had for years been working with and monitoring the family. BEST INTERESTS OF CHILD

Father's Conduct Unlikely to Change Within a Reasonable Time — Reliance on Statutory Presumption Affirmed: In terminating a father's parental rights, the District Court correctly relied on the statutory presumption that the best interests of the children were unlikely to change since both children had been under the care of their grandmother pursuant to a foster care agreement with the Department of Public Health and Human Services for 15 months of the most recent 22 months. The District Court's termination of parental rights was affirmed. In re B.M. and P.M., 2010 MT 114, 356 Mont. 327, 233 P.3d 338.

Sufficient Evidence That Children in Need of Care — Parental Rights Properly Terminated: In 2004, a mother left her two children with a 16-year-old babysitter and did not return for over 24 hours. The children were placed in temporary legal custody with the state, where they remained thereafter. The state attempted to work on reunifying the family, but the mother repeatedly failed to comply with treatment plans, continued her heavy drinking, was arrested several times, and spent periods incarcerated. The children were tribal members, and the state gave proper tribal notification and had an Indian Child Welfare Act expert testify on several occasions that continued parental custody was likely to result in serious emotional or physical harm to the children and that there were no family members available to take the children. The children were adjudicated youth in need of care, and the state eventually sought to terminate the mother's parental rights in 2008. The mother appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. The children had been in foster care for over 4 years, exceeding the threshold for triggering the presumption that termination was in the children's best interests. A reasonable person could conclude, as did the District Court, that the children were in need of care and that the mother's parental rights should be terminated. Substantial evidence showed that the mother: (1) had been charged with four separate criminal offenses and was the subject of a bench warrant; (2) entered an intensive outpatient drug treatment program but stopped after five sessions, indicating a high potential for substance abuse that could only be controlled by incarceration or inpatient treatment; (3) did not complete any parts of the court-approved treatment plan; (4) missed a number of scheduled visits with the children; (5) failed to address her mental health issues; (6) failed to obtain adequate housing; (7) failed to make reunification with the children a priority; and (8) was unlikely to change her pattern of substance abuse and her unstable lifestyle. Failure to Develop Parenting Skills for Four Earlier Children — Termination of Parental Rights to Fifth Child Warranted Absent Improvement in Parenting Abilities: A mother suffered from a chromosomal abnormality known as velocardiofacial syndrome (VCFS) that caused numerous physical and cognitive difficulties and developmental delays, resulting in mental impairment and limited intellectual capacity. The father suffered severe intellectual and personality handicaps that were diagnosed as developmental and irreversible. All of the couple's children were afflicted with VCFS. Despite the efforts of the state to assist the parents in developing parenting skills over a period of several years, the parents proved unable to care for their special needs children, resulting in the termination of parental rights to the couple's first four children. The state attempted to help the parents with their fifth child, who was the subject of this case, but again the parents were unable to properly care for the child, and the state ultimately sought to terminate parental rights in order to place the child with a family that was able to provide the specialized intensive care necessary for the child's development and well-being. The District Court held that the child was a youth in need of care, and based in part on unchanged circumstances from the four previous adjudications regarding the child's siblings, the court terminated the parents' rights. The parents appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. The District Court heard extensive testimony from numerous professionals who worked with the family and opined that because the parents' conditions were permanent, chronic, and irreversible, their inability to care for the child had not changed and would not change in the future. Thus, the court properly concluded that the child was at substantial risk of ongoing or continuing physical or psychological harm by acts or omissions of the parents that were unchanged from their previous parental terminations and that termination in this case was also warranted. Parent's Acquiescence in Adjudicatory Proceedings — Finding That Child Is Youth in Need of Care Based on Parent's Admissions — Stipulation Not Required: A mother contested termination of her parental rights on grounds that her child was not properly adjudicated as a youth in need of care. The mother was incarcerated at the time of the hearing and contended that although she agreed to a treatment plan, she never admitted that the child met the definition of a youth in need of care or stipulated that the child was in need of care. The Supreme Court noted that the trial court should have specifically inquired of the mother or her counsel whether the mother stipulated that the child was a youth in need of care, but it was not error for the District Court to make that finding based on the mother's own admissions that she was addicted to methamphetamine and needed treatment and that her addiction impacted the child unfairly. The mother was not placed at an unfair disadvantage during the termination proceedings and was represented by counsel at all stages. She never questioned the regularity of the proceedings until appeal. The court held that because 35 months had passed between the adjudicatory hearing and the notice of appeal, it would not be in the child's best interests to prolong the matter, particularly when much of the delay was caused by the mother's repeated relapses and her failure to put the child's interests above her desire to indulge her addiction. The adjudication was proper and did not prejudice the mother, and the District Court was affirmed. In re A.S., 2006 MT 281, 334 M 280, 146 P3d 778 (2006).

Termination of Parental Rights of Father Incarcerated for Failure to Pay Child Support Affirmed: A father was incarcerated for failure to pay child support for more than 10 years, resulting in his inability to be available for his child, who had been in foster care for more than 56 consecutive months at the time of hearing. The father's sentence was to run for about 3 additional years. The District Court properly concluded that the child's paramount best interests and needs were best served by continued stable foster care placement and that there was clear and convincing evidence to support termination of the father's parental rights. In re A.N.W., 2006 MT 42, 331 M 208, 130 P3d 619 (2006).

Termination of Parental Rights in Best Interests of Children Despite Parent's Health Improvements: A mother asserted that her psychologist's testimony demonstrated sufficient improvement in her physical and mental health as to warrant reunification with her children or forestalling termination of her parental rights. The District Court concluded that the mother's condition and conduct were not likely to change in a reasonable time and that it was in the children's best interests to terminate the mother's parental rights. On appeal, the Supreme Court noted that the trial court listened to hours of testimony, questioned witnesses personally, was very engaged in the hearing, took judicial notice of other proceedings involving the mother, including criminal proceedings, and reviewed her cases carefully, and concluded that her conduct was not likely to change in a reasonable period of time. The Supreme Court also noted that the psychologist's testimony indicated that the mother's improvement was possibly the result of not having to care for the children and noted the psychologist's continuing concern for the mother's ability to protect the children from abuse or potentially harmful relationships and her unstable moods resulting from deeply rooted personality disorders that were resistant to change. The children's best interests were paramount and took precedence over the mother's parental rights, and the termination order was affirmed. In re M.W., K.W., & A.L., 2004 MT 301, 323 M 433, 102 P3d 6 (2004).

Child in Foster Care for Nineteen Continuous Months — Termination of Parental Rights Presumed to Be in Child's Best Interests: If a child has been in foster care for 15 of the most recent 22 months, the best interests of the child are presumed to be served by the termination of parental rights, pursuant to 41-3-604. Here, after the children were placed with their foster parents, they lived in the foster home for 19 continuous months as of the hearing to terminate parental rights. The District Court did not err in applying the presumption in 41-3-604 in terminating parental rights. In re E.K., C.K., & J.E., 2001 MT 279, 307 M 328, 37 P3d 690 (2001).

Failure of Parents to Comply With Any of Five Different Treatment Plans — Child's Best Interests Paramount: To ensure the proper care of their sexually abused children, the state devised five different treatment plans for the parents over a 2-year period, but none of the plans were successful, so the state sought to terminate parental rights. The parents did not challenge the finding that their children were youths in need of care, but did challenge the appropriateness of the treatment plans, the finding that the plans were unsuccessful, and the finding that their conduct was unlikely to change within a reasonable time. The Supreme Court affirmed the termination. Primary consideration must be given to the best interests of the child as demonstrated by the child's physical, mental, and emotional conditions and needs, and the child's interests take precedence over parental rights. Here, the treatment plans were directed at protecting the children from further sexual abuse within the home and were thus appropriate. Although the parents complied with some obligations of the treatment plans, partial compliance is an insufficient basis upon which to premise error in a finding that a plan was not complied with. Further, a District Court should assess a parent's past and present conduct in determining whether that parent's conduct is unlikely to change within a reasonable time. In this case, ongoing incest between the siblings characterized the parents' inability to provide a safe environment to protect the younger children in the foreseeable future. The children had been in periodic foster care for several years, and numerous treatment plans were provided to the parents, who had considerable time to comply. The District Court did not abuse its discretion in terminating parental rights based on these findings of fact. In re D.H., S.H., K.H., N.S., & J.B., 2001 MT 200, 306 M 278, 33 P3d 616 (2001).

No Evidence of Significant Change in Parenting Ability — Termination of Parental Rights in Children's Best Interests to Establish Permanency and Stability: The District Court granted permanent custody of three children with the Department of Public Health and Human Services (DPHHS) in 1996 after finding that the mother failed to complete her treatment plan and that existing conditions that rendered the mother unfit were unlikely to change within a reasonable time. The Supreme Court affirmed in In re C.M., 281 M 183, 932 P2d 1063 (1997). The DPHHS subsequently petitioned to terminate the mother's parental rights to two of the children. Reiterating its findings from the 1996 order, the District Court determined that no evidence had been presented that the mother had made any significant progress in her ability to parent, concluding that it was in the children's best interests to terminate the mother's parental rights because the children needed permanent placement to successfully progress in their therapy. The court did grant the mother the right to visit the children when the DPHHS determined that the children were psychologically ready for visitation to occur. The mother appealed. The Supreme Court examined the evidence and affirmed. The children's continued fantasy of being returned to their mother's care someday was detrimental to the therapeutic process, and termination of parental rights was supported by substantial evidence and not otherwise clearly erroneous. In re Custody & Parental Rights of F.M. & S.M., 2001 MT 93, 305 M 189, 24 P3d 208 (2001).

Children's Best Interests Met by Termination of Parental Rights:

The District Court's finding, that it was in the child's best interests to terminate the mother's parental rights, was amply supported in the record. The mother proved unable to follow her doctor's recommendations in regard to exposing her children to her adult male companions, demonstrated a repeated inability to put her children's needs before her own (including her historical inability to select appropriate male companions and accept responsibility for placing the children in dangerous circumstances), had an inconsistent history of visitation, and was unable to meet the youngest child's need for a family environment characterized by very high levels of nurturance, stability, and predictability and by freedom from further risk of sexual abuse or violence. In re B.F., R.F., & M.S., 2000 MT 231, 301 M 281, 8 P3d 790, 57 St. Rep. 954 (2000).

Father argued that the best interests of his children did not require termination of his parental rights, pointing to instances in the transcript where the foster mother testified she had no objection to supervised contact and where a psychologist testified that some contact would pose little risk to the children. However, termination was proper in light of substantial credible evidence by the child psychologist who counseled the children and recommended no visitation and by the father's evaluating psychologist who testified that termination might be beneficial to father in the long run. In re S.P., 241 M 190, 786 P2d 642, 47 St. Rep. 190 (1990).

Termination of Parental Rights Rather Than Award of Temporary State Custody Pending Parent's Release From Prison — Child's Best Interests: Rather than award temporary custody to the state pending release of the mother from incarceration, the District Court terminated the mother's parental rights instead, which she asserted was error. Adjudication of the child as a youth in need of care was not disputed, and two treatment plans were not successful. In reaching its decision that the mother's fitness to parent was unlikely to change, the court considered the mother's possible long-term confinement as well as all reasonable efforts by state protective services to rehabilitate her, relying on evidence regarding her parenting skills, the length of her incarceration, and the child's bonding with a foster family after placement with the family 3 weeks after birth. The court properly gave primary consideration to the physical, mental, and emotional needs of the child and correctly determined that, in the child's best interests, termination of the mother's parental rights was proper rather than awarding temporary custody to the state pending the mother's release from prison. In re J.H., 2000 MT 11, 298 M 41, 994 P2d 37, 57 St. Rep. 60 (2000).

Child's Best Interest of Primary Consideration for Termination of Parental Rights: When considering the criteria for termination of parental rights, courts must give primary consideration to the best interests of the child, as demonstrated by the child's mental, physical, and emotional conditions and needs. Absence of Court-Approved Treatment Plan Not Bar to Termination of Parental Rights — Warning to Follow Law in Future Cases: In proceedings to terminate a mother's parental rights, the Department prepared and executed a treatment plan, but the mother refused to sign it. The plan was filed with the court, but the judge failed to officially sign it. The court found that the mother had allowed her children to be sexually abused or exploited and terminated her parental rights. The mother appealed on the grounds that this section requires a court-approved treatment plan before parental rights may be terminated. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed the termination despite the requirements of this section and warned the Department to follow the law in future cases or risk reversal of terminations. This section does not require that the parent sign the treatment plan in order for the court to approve it. In re Inquiry Into M.M., 274 M 166, 906 P2d 675, 52 St. Rep. 1170 (1995).

Failure to Complete Alcohol Treatment Programs Grounds for Termination of Parental Rights: T.M., whose mother died when he was 14 months old, was diagnosed as having fetal alcohol syndrome and required constant parental supervision. His father was repeatedly incarcerated for alcohol-related offenses and unable to take care of T.M. during those times. T.M.'s father also repeatedly failed to complete treatment programs for alcohol abuse, domestic violence, and anger management. The Supreme Court held that in applying its standard of review, the lower court's decision to terminate T.M.'s father's parental rights was not clearly erroneous given the fact that the record showed that the father had failed to complete required treatment and that it was in the best interests of the child that the father's parental rights be terminated. In re Custody of T.M., 267 M 75, 881 P2d 1333, 51 St. Rep. 952 (1994).

Status as Youth in Need of Care as Satisfaction of Prerequisites for Best Interests Test: The mother argued that the lower court erroneously applied the "best interests of the children" standard in terminating her parental rights. The Supreme Court ruled that the lower court was correct in applying the standard because its finding that the children were youth in need of care met the threshold requirement of finding dependency, abuse, or neglect. In re B.H.M., C.M.M., & J.T.H., 245 M 179, 799 P2d 1090, 47 St. Rep. 1967 (1990), followed in In re Custody & Parental Rights of M.D., 262 M 183, 864 P2d 783, 50 St. Rep. 1505 (1993).

Mother's Conduct Unlikely to Change Significantly Despite Evidence of Recent Rehabilitation: The trial court properly terminated a mother's parental rights and awarded custody of her two children to the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) with the authority to consent to adoption when it was shown to be in the best interests of the children. Substantial evidence established that the children were abused and neglected; the mother had agreed to an approved treatment plan but failed to meet its conditions; and the conduct or condition that rendered the mother an unfit parent was not likely to change within a reasonable time. The court properly considered evidence of the mother's alleged rehabilitation but its determination, based on 6 years of neglect and abuse, that her conduct was unlikely to change significantly in the future was based on substantial evidence and was not an abuse of its discretion. In re C.A.R. & P.J.R., 214 M 174, 693 P2d 1214, 41 St. Rep. 2395 (1984).

ABANDONMENT

Stepparent's Petition to Terminate Biological Parent's Parental Rights Granted Given Evidence of Abandonment: A custodial stepparent has standing to petition for termination of a noncustodial parent's parental rights. In this case, the custodial stepmother petitioned for and was granted termination of the noncustodial mother's rights in order to allow for adoption of the child by the stepmother. The mother appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. The District Court concluded that the mother abandoned the child and thus was an unfit parent. As evidence of abandonment, the court did not err in considering: (1) the mother's time in prison and residential drug treatment, during which she had no contact with the child; (2) during the mother's periods of absence, the mother's struggle with an abusive relationship, use of illegal drugs, and associations with known criminals; (3) the mother's failure to follow through on commitments to care for and visit the child; and (4) a lack of intent on the mother's part to resume care of the child in the future, regardless of any understanding that an initial parenting plan was temporary. Evidence of abandonment was substantial, and the District Court did not err in granting the petition to terminate the mother's parental rights. In re Adoption of K.P.M., 2009 MT 31, 349 M 170, 201 P3d 833 (2009).

Two-Year Wait to Assert Parental Rights — Failure to Advise Parent of Right to Counsel Harmless Error: A father who was incarcerated waited more than 2 years to file for relief following termination of his parental rights, asserting that he was denied due process by not being provided notice of the right to counsel. The Supreme Court agreed that fairness requires that a parent be represented by counsel at parental termination proceedings, but in this case, the error was harmless because the lack of notice was not prejudicial to the father. There was adequate evidence to terminate the father's parental rights, and even if he had been notified and represented by counsel, there was no way that an attorney would have made a difference under the circumstances and the result would have been the same. Denial of the motion for relief was affirmed. In re P.D.L., 2004 MT 346, 324 M 327, 102 P3d 1225 (2004).

Improper Termination of Rights of Noncustodial Parent on Grounds of Abandonment Absent Showing of Willful Surrender of Custody: The District Court terminated a father's parental rights after finding that he abandoned his children by willfully surrendering physical custody for a period of 6 months without manifesting a firm intention to resume physical custody or making permanent physical arrangements for care of the children. The father appealed on grounds that he could not have willfully surrendered custody because he did not have physical custody of the children, who were initially with the mother and then in state foster care. The Supreme Court agreed. Acknowledging that pursuant to In re M.W., 234 M 530, 764 P2d 1279 (1988), it is possible for a court to find that a noncustodial parent has abandoned children, that finding must be based on evidence that the parent did not intend to resume the children's care, which was not the case here. Rather, the District Court in this case found that the father willfully surrendered physical custody, which was directly controverted by the fact that the father could not surrender custody that he did not have. Termination of the father's parental rights under that theory of abandonment was reversible error. In re T.C. & W.C., 2001 MT 264, 307 M 244, 37 P3d 70 (2001).

No Treatment Plan Required to Terminate Parental Rights When Child Abandoned: A mother's parental rights were terminated based on the determination that she had abandoned her children, and the mother appealed. The children had been in out-of-home placement for longer than 1 year, and the mother had no contact with the children for almost 6 years, so no court-approved treatment plan was ever devised for the mother. The Supreme Court found that the mother's minimal efforts to contact the Department of Public Health and Human Services after termination proceedings were initiated were not sufficient to show the mother's intent to resume the care of her children, so the District Court did not err when it terminated the mother's parental rights on grounds of abandonment. A treatment plan is not required when the District Court finds that a parent has abandoned a child. In re J.J. & C.J., 2001 MT 131, 305 M 431, 28 P3d 1076 (2001).

Evidence of Intent to Remedy Child's Situation During Time of Alleged Abandonment — Finding of Abandonment Reversed: The state alleged abandonment by father from September 1994 to January 1995. Evidence showed that father had an unimpressive history as a parent, offering little or no financial or emotional support during the first 5 years of his son's life. Nevertheless, father's actions during the time in question, including a petition to modify the dissolution decree to allow him visitation, contact with the mother to arrange visitation, and a trip from Wisconsin to visit his son, precluded a finding of abandonment during that finite period. In re W.Z., 285 M 16, 946 P2d 125, 54 St. Rep. 1019 (1997).

Termination of Parental Rights Based on Abandonment — Sporadic Attempts to Maintain Custody of Child Held Insufficient: Linda, the natural mother of P.E., left P.E. at a camping site with persons barely known to Linda. For the next 14 months, Linda traveled with persons with known criminal records, failed to give social workers her address and phone number on several occasions, failed to accept or maintain gainful employment, and failed to keep appointments with social workers or to appear at hearings to determine the status of P.E. Despite her expressed intent to resume physical custody, the District Court terminated her parental rights. Citing In re Adoption of C.R.D., 240 M 106, 782 P2d 1280 (1989), the Supreme Court affirmed, holding that Linda's sporadic attempts to maintain physical custody of P.E. did not constitute "a firm intention to resume physical custody" pursuant to 41-3-102. In re P.E., 282 M 52, 934 P2d 206, 54 St. Rep. 237 (1997).

Presence of at Least One Threshold Requirement Necessary — Abandonment: Mother willfully surrendered physical custody of her 6-month-old twins to a neighbor, with the representation that it would be for the day. About 3 ½ years later, the twins continued to reside with the neighbor, with no evidence that mother ever indicated that she intended to resume custody or attempted to make permanent legal arrangements for the children's care. It was not an abuse of discretion for the District Court to conclude that the children were abandoned pursuant to subsection (1)(b) of this section and that parental rights should be terminated. A court must determine the presence of at least one of the threshold requirements set forth in subsection (1) of this section to terminate a parent-child relationship. Because abandonment was a sufficient basis for termination of parental rights, it was not necessary to determine whether there was a sufficient basis for termination under other provisions of subsection (1) of this section. In re D.H. & F.H., 264 M 521, 872 P2d 803, 51 St. Rep. 386 (1994).

Six-Month Abandonment Requirement Applicable Only to Willful Surrender of Physical Custody: The requirement in 41-3-102(3)(d) that applies a 6-month period to the definition of abandonment that is part of the definition of harm to a child's health or welfare is applicable only to the willful surrender of physical custody of the child. It was therefore proper to terminate the parental rights of a parent who left children for a 5-month period under circumstances that made reasonable the belief that the parent did not intend to resume care of them. In re A.E., C.E., S.R., & J.R., 255 M 56, 840 P2d 572, 49 St. Rep. 877 (1992), followed in In re W.Z., 285 M 16, 946 P2d 125, 54 St. Rep. 1019 (1997).

Lack of Contact for Three Years Constituting Abandonment: The District Court did not abuse its discretion in terminating the parental rights of a father who abandoned his child by having no contact for 3 years and by indicating at no time his intention to resume custody until he learned his parental rights had been terminated. In re M.W., 234 M 530, 764 P2d 1279, 45 St. Rep. 2107 (1988).

Statute Constitutional — Abandonment by Noncustodial Parent: Father whose parental rights were terminated questioned the constitutionality of this section with regard to noncustodial parents. The Supreme Court found that the legal relationship between father and child did not change despite the facts that the mother was awarded custody and that the father failed to continue in his obligations to the child. In determining what constitutes abandonment, 41-3-102 considers the action of the parent responsible for the child's welfare, not the action of the custodial or noncustodial parent. In re M.W., 234 M 530, 764 P2d 1279, 45 St. Rep. 2107 (1988).

Evidence of Abandonment — Termination Proper: Evidence of abandonment warranting termination of parental rights was sufficient when the father had no contact and did not state any intention of resuming care of his children for a period of 2 years and did not make known his intention to acquire custody until 3 months after he was informed of the custody proceedings filed by the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services). In re M.J.D., C.K.D., & A.R.D., 225 M 200, 731 P2d 937, 44 St. Rep. 167 (1987).

Abandonment — Termination Proceedings to Be Fundamentally Fair: Termination of a natural parent's right to care and custody of a child is a fundamental liberty interest in Montana, which must be protected by fundamentally fair procedures. In a proceeding to terminate parental rights, the mother testified that on the advice of a social worker she refused to disclose to the father, who was in prison, the name of the child's foster parents; the father testified that while in prison he had tried to contact his son and see how he was doing. The Supreme Court held that this testimony contradicted the District Court's finding that father had abandoned child, and the Supreme Court remanded the case to the District Court for additional findings of fact and conclusions in light of specific requirements of 41-3-102. The Supreme Court also found the District Court record insufficient to conclude whether or not implementation of a treatment plan was attempted or feasible. The rights of parents cannot be terminated unless the parents have failed to comply with a court-approved treatment plan. In re R.B., 217 M 99, 703 P2d 846, 42 St. Rep. 1055 (1985), followed in In re W.Z., 285 M 16, 946 P2d 125, 54 St. Rep. 1019 (1997), In re E.W., C.W., & A.W., 1998 MT 135, 289 M 190, 959 P2d 951, 55 St. Rep. 536 (1998), and In re A.W-M., 1998 MT 157, 289 M 333, 960 P2d 779, 55 St. Rep. 628 (1998). ABUSE AND NEGLECT

Requirement That Child Be Adjudicated Youth in Need of Care Met by Parents' Stipulation in Adoption of Treatment Plans — Harmless Error: A father contended that all proceedings related to a parental rights termination were invalid because the children had never been formally adjudicated as youths in need of care. The Supreme Court found that in this case, the absence of a formal adjudication was harmless error because the parents previously agreed that their children were abused or neglected when the parents stipulated to that fact during the adoption of four separate treatment plans. The evidence of abuse and neglect was overwhelming, and if the parents had objected to temporary legal custody or to subsequent District Court findings or if they had disputed the status of the children as youths in need of care, the District Court could have easily made a ruling on the children's status at that time. The parents were afforded full due process at every stage and had ample opportunity to object to the proceedings and findings, yet they stipulated and agreed to the District Court findings through counsel at every turn. Although failure to adhere to statutory requirements governing termination proceedings will generally constitute grounds for reversal, this case was one of the rare occasions that application of the harmless error doctrine was warranted. The procedural error did not affect the outcome of the termination proceedings or substantively prejudice the parents, and termination was affirmed. Evidence of Parent's Conviction for Sexual Abuse of Child Sufficient Basis for Termination of Parental Rights: The state petitioned to terminate C.T.'s parental rights on grounds that his child S.T. and the child's mother had lived with C.T. for 2 years, that C.T. was a convicted sex offender, and that both mother and child had been exposed to domestic violence. Without objection, the District Court took judicial notice of C.T.'s conviction for sexual intercourse with a minor and granted the state's petition. C.T. appealed on grounds that the court abused its discretion by terminating his parental rights on the basis of facts not alleged in the petition or supported by the evidence, asserting that even though the court took judicial notice of the conviction, that court never received the documents into evidence and therefore erred by relying on that evidence in entering its findings of fact. The Supreme Court declined to recognize a distinction between taking judicial notice and entering the noticed facts into evidence. In a civil proceeding, judicially noticed facts are accepted as conclusive, and once a fact is judicially noticed, the party offering the evidence is relieved of the duty to also move for its admission. Thus, C.T.'s conviction was not subject to reasonable dispute, and the District Court was entitled to rely on the conviction as clear and convincing evidence that C.T. had sexually abused a child and to rely on 41-3-423(2)(a) as a statutory basis for terminating C.T.'s parental rights. The District Court was affirmed. In re S.T., 2008 MT 19, 341 M 176, 176 P3d 1054 (2008).

Chronic and Severe Neglect Inclusive of Emotional Neglect: In terminating parental rights without reunification services, the state relied on 41-3-423 and this section in a case of chronic, severe neglect of a child. A parent asserted that parental rights may not be terminated based on a finding of severe emotional neglect, but the Supreme Court held that by definition, neglect includes psychological harm to a child. Here, the parent's ongoing drug use and repeated incarceration resulted in the parent's unavailability to the child and inconsistent caregiving, and this neglect in turn produced high anxiety and emotional disturbance in the child. Parental rights were thus properly terminated based on chronic, severe emotional neglect. In re Custody & Parental Rights of D.S., 2005 MT 275, 329 M 180, 122 P3d 1239 (2005).

Failure to Protect Child From Physical Abuse and to Feed Child — Sufficient Evidence of Abuse: Following termination of her parental rights, a mother contended that there was insufficient evidence to find that she had abused her child. The Supreme Court disagreed. There was convincing testimony that the mother failed to protect the child from physical abuse by her boyfriend and that on at least one occasion, she neglected to feed the child until 4:30 p.m. This evidence met the statutory definition of child abuse or neglect, and the characterization of her treatment of the child as abuse was not clearly erroneous. In re Custody & Parental Rights of C.J.K., 2005 MT 67, 326 M 289, 109 P3d 232 (2005).

Adjudication of Child as Youth in Need of Care Based on Prospective Abuse Proper: A mother relinquished custody of her three children after the District Court determined that the children were in need of care. When she became pregnant again, the state moved for emergency protective services for the fourth child upon its birth. The father contended that because the child was removed from the parents at birth, it was never abuse or neglected and thus could not properly have been adjudicated as a youth in need of care. Citing In re C.P., 2001 MT 187, 306 M 238, 32 P3d 754 (2001), the Supreme Court disagreed. The circumstances related to the prior termination of the mother's parental rights to her three children had not changed, and because she would also be the primary caregiver for the fourth child, there was substantial risk to the health and welfare of the newborn child as well, so the District Court did not err in adjudicating the fourth child as a youth in need of care based on prospective abuse. In re K.C.H., 2003 MT 125, 316 M 13, 68 P3d 788 (2003).

Substantial Risk of Harm to Child — Parental Rights Terminated Despite Lack of Evidence of Abuse or Neglect: A girl was born to a mother who was later divorced and remarried. When the girl was 15, she had sexual intercourse with her stepfather and conceived a baby. The state petitioned for temporary investigative authority (TIA) and emergency protective services (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427) over both the girl and her baby, pursuant to 41-3-402 (renumbered 41-3-427). The mother then agreed to divorce the stepfather so that he could marry the girl. The petition regarding the girl was dismissed because she was married and was no longer subject to the mother's parental control. At the show cause hearing on the petition regarding protection of the baby, a state social worker testified that, although there was no indication of actual abuse or neglect of the baby, there was concern for the baby's safety should the baby be placed in the home with the girl and stepfather. The state ultimately petitioned to terminate the girl's parental rights to the baby. The District Court determined that the baby was a youth in need of care and terminated the girl's parental rights. The girl appealed on grounds that the court's determination that the baby was a youth in need of care was erroneous, absent any evidence of abuse, neglect, or abandonment, and that the petition for TIA was insufficient on its face because it contained no allegations that the baby was abused or neglected. However, the definition of abuse or neglect in 41-3-102 includes either actual harm or the substantial risk of harm. Thus, the report required by 41-3-427 need set forth in detail only facts supporting the petition's request for TIA based on the assertion that a child is abused or neglected or is in danger of being abused or neglected. The social worker's testimony was considered sufficient to support a finding that there was substantial risk of harm to the baby if returned to the girl's custody; therefore, the District Court's determination that the baby was a youth in need of care was correct. The court's finding that under the circumstances, the baby had little hope of a normal emotional, moral, and psychological development with his parents was also supported by substantial evidence and was not clearly erroneous, based on the social worker's testimony that the girl's relationship with the stepfather was unhealthy, that the family unit exhibited extremely poor boundaries, and that the girl had obvious psychological damage from being sexually abused by her father and would, without successful treatment, be unable to set appropriate boundaries for the baby or be able to understand the risk of harm that her relationship with the stepfather posed to the baby. The Supreme Court affirmed. In re D.T.H., 2001 MT 138, 305 M 502, 29 P3d 1003 (2001).

Child in Danger of Abuse and Neglect Subject to Adjudication Regardless of Whether Actual Abuse or Neglect Occurred: A child who is in danger of being abused or neglected may be considered a youth in need of care regardless of whether actual abuse or neglect occurred, irrespective of a parent's care for the child prior to the parent's incarceration or commitment to a mental hospital. In re A.M., 2001 MT 60, 304 M 379, 22 P3d 185 (2001).

Record Showing Child to Be Youth in Need of Care and Failure of Mother to Complete Treatment Plan Held Sufficient for Termination of Parental Rights: The parental rights of M.M., the natural mother of A.W-M., were terminated by the District Court based on its finding that A.W-M. was a youth in need of care and that M.M. failed to complete her treatment plan. The Supreme Court reviewed the District Court record and found that the record contained substantial credible evidence that A.W-M. was a youth in need of care, including evidence that A.W-M. was left with a babysitter when she was 7 months old and sick with bronchitis, that after treatment, doctors would not release A.W-M. to her mother's care because her mother "appeared to be high", that M.M. made little effort to comply with her treatment plan, and that A.W-M. had been left with other caregivers for indefinite periods of time. The Supreme Court also found substantial evidence that M.M. could not be expected to complete her treatment plan in the foreseeable future, including evidence that she tested positive for use of a controlled substance, was unable to obtain stable employment or housing, failed to attend court-ordered counseling, visited only sporadically with A.W-M., and agreed in her testimony that she should not be given further time to comply with her treatment plan. In re A.W-M., 1998 MT 157, 289 M 333, 960 P2d 779, 55 St. Rep. 628 (1998).

Absence of Court-Approved Treatment Plan Not Bar to Termination of Parental Rights — Warning to Follow Law in Future Cases: In proceedings to terminate a mother's parental rights, the Department prepared and executed a treatment plan, but the mother refused to sign it. The plan was filed with the court, but the judge failed to officially sign it. The court found that the mother had allowed her children to be sexually abused or exploited and terminated her parental rights. The mother appealed on the grounds that this section requires a court-approved treatment plan before parental rights may be terminated. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed the termination despite the requirements of this section and warned the Department to follow the law in future cases or risk reversal of terminations. This section does not require that the parent sign the treatment plan in order for the court to approve it. In re Inquiry Into M.M., 274 M 166, 906 P2d 675, 52 St. Rep. 1170 (1995).

Lack of Care, Supervision, and Guidance — Threats of Sexual and Physical Abuse — Termination Proper: After finding that the children were youths in need of care because they were not under the care and supervision of a suitable adult, had no proper guidance, and were threatened with sexual and physical abuse, the District Court properly terminated mother's parental rights, noting her failure to comply with a treatment plan or to change her conduct that continually endangered her children. In re A.W. & A.V., 247 M 268, 806 P2d 520, 48 St. Rep. 192 (1991).

Continuation of Unfitness of Parents: Evidence in an action to terminate parental rights showing that father had a history of violent behavior, had been arrested for physically abusing his wife, and was known to have abused his children; that both parents routinely drank alcoholic beverages to excess, that they became aggressive and violent under the influence of alcohol, and that they were generally unable to properly care for their children at such times; and that counseling had been unsuccessful because of the parents' hostile and uncooperative attitude and failure to participate clearly supported the finding under subsection (2) of this section that the conduct or condition of the parents rendering them unfit was unlikely to change within a reasonable time. In re J.L.S. & A.D.S., 234 M 201, 761 P2d 838, 45 St. Rep. 1842 (1988). See also In re R.B., 242 M 141, 788 P2d 1361, 47 St. Rep. 642 (1990).

Inability to Follow Through on Treatment for Chronic Mental Condition Sufficient to Warrant Termination of Rights: A mother's undifferentiated schizophrenia was a chronic condition, and because of her inability to follow through on her prescribed psychiatric treatment plan, the conduct that rendered her unfit as a mother was not likely to change within a reasonable time. Termination of her parental rights was proper. In re J.W. & J.C., 232 M 46, 757 P2d 769, 45 St. Rep. 855 (1988).

Sexual Abuse and Failure to Seek Treatment — Parental Rights Terminated: The District Court was presented with clear and convincing evidence that children were sexually abused, but the abusive parent did not enter into treatment or have the court approve an appropriate treatment program and was evaluated at court order only. The court properly terminated the parent's rights on the merits. Custody of R.A.D. & J.D., 231 M 143, 753 P2d 862, 45 St. Rep. 496 (1988).

Reasonable Time for Change — Construction With Age of Child: The trial court properly terminated a father's parental rights when there was substantial credible evidence to the effect that despite his good intentions to do so, the father was unable to provide for his child's mental and emotional needs. The child's age (9 years) made it imperative that she be provided with a loving, stable home as soon as possible. Expert testimony indicated that her well-being could not stand further delay. In re D.S.N., 222 M 312, 722 P2d 614, 43 St. Rep. 1291 (1986).

Termination of Mother's Rights — Test: The State met its burden of proof and District Court acted within the proper scope of discretion in terminating mother's parental rights where, among other things, testimony showed that the father lived apart from the mother, the residence was in a consistently filthy and deplorable condition, the child had inadequate sleeping facilities, meals, and clothing, the mother had been evicted three times because of the condition of the home, the child was beginning to manifest autistic behavior, and the mother had been diagnosed as a paranoid schizophrenic with serious ambivalence in regard to her roles as a mother and a person and a lack of ongoing capacity to provide long-term care for the child. Clear and convincing evidence in the record that a child is neglected and that it is in the best interests of the child that parental rights be severed sustains judgment declaring the child to be in the need of care and granting state agency permanent custody with the right to consent to adoption. In re Declaring K.V. and K.A. Youth in Need of Care, 199 M 516, 649 P2d 1308, 39 St. Rep. 1582 (1982). See also In re C.A.R. & P.J.R., 214 M 174, 693 P2d 1214, 41 St. Rep. 2395 (1984).

Evidence Supporting Termination of Parent-Child Legal Relationship: Where the child had been determined to be a youth in need of care, the father was serving a 10-year prison sentence, and a clinical psychologist testified that the mother was not interested in learning how to parent and probably could not do so unless she received 2 to 3 years of counseling, the evidence supported the termination of parent-child legal relationship. In re R.J.W., 197 M 286, 642 P2d 1072, 39 St. Rep. 568 (1982).

TREATMENT PLAN AND COMPLIANCE

Compliance With Treatment Plan — Actual Effectuation of Purposes Required: Based on the facts of the case, the District Court did not abuse its discretion when it terminated parental rights based on whether the parents complied with the appropriate treatment plan. District Courts must do more than mechanistically check items off a task list. A court must determine whether parents have actually effectuated the purposes of a treatment plan — a parent does not successfully complete a treatment plan by partial or even substantial compliance. In re I.B., 2011 MT 82, 360 Mont. 132, 255 P.3d 56.

Department's Reunification Efforts Held Reasonable — Termination of Parental Rights Over Siblings Held Sufficient Justification — No Abuse of Discretion: After the District Court terminated a mother's parental rights over her child C.J., the mother appealed, claiming as unreasonable the 4 ½ months that passed between the petition by the Department of Public Health and Human Services (Department) to be exempted from the "reasonable efforts" for reunification requirement under 41-3-423(2)(e), because the mother's rights over C.J.'s two siblings had also been terminated, and the date of the hearing. The Supreme Court held that the Department's efforts were reasonable notwithstanding the Department's petition, that there was no timeline provided in the statutes for the hearing, that the delay in holding the hearing did not subject the mother to a fundamentally unfair proceeding, and that the mother was correctly not given a treatment plan because her circumstances met the requirements of 41-3-609(1)(d) and 41-3-423(2)(e) regarding termination of a mother's rights over one child because her rights over other siblings were previously terminated. Therefore, the Supreme Court held that there was no abuse of discretion by the District Court in terminating the mother's parental rights over C.J. In re C.J., 2010 MT 179, 357 Mont. 219, 237 P.3d 1282.

Incarceration of Parent for More Than One Year — No Requirement for Treatment Plan Prior to Termination of Parental Rights: When her child was only 1 month old, a mother was extradited to Texas and subsequently was sentenced to 2 years in prison. The state sought to terminate parental rights based on the mother's long-term incarceration and the needs of the baby. The District Court found that the baby deserved permanency and that the mother had not shown any likelihood that she could provide needed care considering her history of substance abuse, failure to participate in ordered treatment, continued criminal conduct, and long-term incarceration. The court therefore terminated the mother's parental rights and awarded permanent legal custody of the child to the state, with the right to consent to adoption. The mother appealed on grounds that it was improper to terminate parental rights without first providing an opportunity to complete a treatment plan. The Supreme Court concluded that because the mother was incarcerated for more than 1 year, there was no requirement that a treatment plan be implemented prior to termination of parental rights. Reunification with the mother was not in the best interests of the child, considering placement options and the child's developmental, cognitive, and psychological needs and age. Termination of parental rights was affirmed. In re J.A.S., 2010 MT 47, 355 Mont. 302, 228 P.3d 1119.

Failure of Treatment Plan and Parent's Behavior Unlikely to Change: A mother stipulated that her child was a youth in need of care and subsequently failed to comply with her treatment plan, having been arrested and incarcerated for several felony offenses before completing the plan. There was also substantial evidence that the mother was unlikely to change her behavior in a reasonable time, being deeply involved in alcohol abuse and domestic violence, unable to control her anger and aggression, and a high risk to violate conditions of her parole and to return to prison. Termination of the mother's parental rights was affirmed. In re A.J.W., 2010 MT 42, 355 Mont. 264, 227 P.3d 1012.

Mother's Stipulation That Child Be Adjudicated Youth in Need of Care Prior to Determination of Child's Status as Indian — Parental Termination Proceedings Not Invalidated: The state petitioned for termination of a mother's parental rights based on her lack of progress with the court-ordered treatment plan. The state recognized the child's Indian status and notified the Blackfeet Tribe. The tribe's motion to intervene in order to monitor the proceedings was granted, and the mother's parental rights were terminated the following day after the mother stipulated to adjudication of the child as a youth in need of care. The mother subsequently appealed on grounds that it was error to terminate her parental rights prior to a determination that the child was subject to the Indian Child Welfare Act (ICWA). The Supreme Court disagreed and affirmed. The District Court complied with ICWA in finding by clear and convincing evidence that the child was a youth in need of care and that the child's best interests would be served by termination of the parent-child relationship. The fact that the court accepted the mother's stipulation before definitively establishing the child's Indian status did not invalidate the proceedings. The District Court was affirmed. In re J.M., 2009 MT 332, 353 M 64, 218 P3d 1213 (2009).

Minimal Progress on Treatment Plan With No Hope of Improvement — Termination of Parental Rights Affirmed: Despite repeated warnings in open court and repeated attempts by her social worker and other professionals who tried to work with her, a mother still had not completed treatment plan requirements after 1 year or changed her destructive habits of living with violent substance-abusing men, failing to maintain employment, and failing to take personal responsibility for the serious situation she was in regarding her children. Absent a demonstration that she was committed to making reunion with her children her most important goal or that her situation was not going to change within a reasonable time, the District Court did not misapprehend the court's role or requirements of law in terminating the mother's parental rights. In re C.M.C., 2009 MT 153, 350 M 391, 208 P3d 809 (2009).

Parent in Long-Term Federal Incarceration Unable to Comply With Treatment Plan — Termination of Parental Rights Affirmed: The District Court terminated the parental rights of a father who was incarcerated in federal prison for a long-term sentence. The father asserted that the District Court erred in terminating his parental rights because it was not in the children's best interests and that the court should have allowed the children to continue their relationship with their loving, but temporarily absent, father. The Supreme Court disagreed. The best interests of the child are of paramount importance and take precedence over parental rights, and the need for permanent placement of children in a loving and stable home supersedes the parents' interests. The District Court kept informed about the children's placements and placement failures and made arrangements for their placement in a stable home. Given the fact that the father's long-term incarceration would not provide the opportunity for adequate parenting, and the father's failure to comply with a court-ordered parenting plan, the District Court did not abuse its discretion by terminating the father's parental rights and placing the children in permanent foster care. In re B.S. & G.S., 2009 MT 98, 350 M 86, 206 P3d 565 (2009).

Petition as Adequate Notice: The Supreme Court held that the Department of Public Health and Human Services' affidavit and petition for emergency protective services, adjudication as youth in need of care, and temporary legal custody unquestionably gave the mother notice that the allegations were more than actual physical abuse. In re T.C., 2008 MT 335, 346 M 200, 194 P3d 653, (2008).

Failure to Modify Written Treatment Plan Following Neuropsychological Evaluation Not Error: Following remand pursuant to In re D.B. & D.B., 2007 MT 246, 339 M 240, 168 P3d 691 (2007), the District Court applied the original treatment plan, setting out 21 specific tasks the mother was to accomplish. The mother subsequently underwent a neuropsychological evaluation that identified cognitive and emotional disabilities, but the written treatment plan was not revised to specifically address the results of the evaluation, which the mother asserted rendered the treatment plan inappropriate. The Supreme Court disagreed. There was sufficient evidence to support the appropriateness of the plan, including: (1) testimony from counselors that they were aware of the diagnoses and modified their assistance methods accordingly; (2) evidence that the treatment plan was customized in numerous ways to meet the mother's particular needs; and (3) tasks established in the treatment plan could have been undertaken immediately and pursued on an ongoing and simultaneous basis. In re D.B. & D.B., 2008 MT 272, 345 M 225, 190 P3d 1072 (2008).

Individual Explanations for Findings That Conduct and Conditions Unlikely to Change — Termination Affirmed: Following remand pursuant to In re D.B. & D.B., 2007 MT 246, 339 M 240, 168 P3d 691 (2007), the District Court applied the original treatment plan, setting out 21 specific tasks the mother was to accomplish. The court subsequently examined each of the conditions for compliance and terminated the mother's parental rights. Although the court determined that eight of the tasks had been accomplished and found that the mother's conduct related to five tasks was unlikely to change, the court was not able to definitively conclude whether the mother's conduct regarding the eight remaining tasks was unlikely to change. Nevertheless, the court provided individual explanations for its findings related to all the tasks and thus met the statutory requirement to consider whether the mother would continue to be unfit, unable, or unwilling to provide her children with adequate parental care. The District Court was affirmed. In re D.B. & D.B., 2008 MT 272, 345 M 225, 190 P3d 1072 (2008).

Failure to Complete Treatment Plan and Lack of Evidence That Conduct Likely to Change in Reasonable Time — Children in Foster Care for 17 of 22 Months — Parental Rights Properly Terminated: When D.A. was born in 2003, he and both parents tested positive for methamphetamine, and the state immediately obtained temporary custody of D.A. The case was dismissed 10 months later. When M.A. was born in 2005, the mother again tested positive for methamphetamine, and the state removed both children and placed them in foster care. The parents completed treatment plans and the children were returned to their care. About 2 months later, the parents were arrested on drug-related charges and the children were again removed, placed in foster care, and adjudicated youths in need of care. The parents agreed to another treatment plan, which included addressing and conquering their drug addictions and maintaining visitation with their children, increasing visitation when appropriate, and increasing parenting responsibilities until they were reunited with their children. However, the parents never completed the treatment plan, and their visitation actually decreased because of the children's negative reactions to the visits. Rather than adopt the state's proposed permanency plan calling for reunification, the District Court ordered the state to take steps to permanently place the children. Subsequently, after the children had been in foster care for 17 of the previous 22 months, the state moved to terminate the parents' rights. At the hearing, witnesses testified that it would take another year to know if reunification would be possible. In the interests of the children, the District Court terminated the parents' rights. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. The District Court correctly held that the parents had not completed their treatment plan and that as a matter of fact the conditions rendering the parents unfit were unlikely to change in a reasonable time, based on their past drug use and the effect their use had on their ability to care for their children. Nor was it error for the court to consider the presumption that, because the children had been in foster care for 17 months, termination of parental rights was in the children's best interests. Additionally, there was sufficient evidence for the court to conclude that the state's permanency plan was not in the children's best interests, and having rejected the plan, the court had the authority to order the state to take specific steps to effectuate an alternate plan, which could include adoption of the children. Entering the order following the permanency hearing to advance the children's best interests did not constitute plain error or violate the parents' due process rights, and termination of parental rights was not plain error or an abuse of discretion. In re Custody & Parental Rights of D.A. & M.A., 2008 MT 247, 344 M 513, 189 P3d 631 (2008).

Failure to Abide by Drug Use Restrictions and Housing Requirements in Treatment Plan — Termination of Parental Rights Warranted: A mother's treatment plan required her to remain drug and alcohol free and to maintain appropriate housing for her children. The state asserted that the mother had failed both conditions and sought to terminate her parental rights. The District Court agreed and terminated her parental rights. The mother appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Evidence showed that the mother continued to use drugs, even in the presence of her children, was arrested for drug possession, failed numerous urinalysis tests, and failed to show up for drug testing on several occasions. The mother also failed to maintain appropriate housing for her children for 12 of the first 14 months from the beginning of the treatment plan, having lost her housing because of nonpayment of rent. The children were removed from their mother's custody on three separate occasions during periods of sobriety and relapse, yet the children's removal did not prompt the mother to refrain from drug use or from continued abusive relationships that threatened both her and her children. The District Court did not err in concluding that the mother's conduct rendering her unfit to parent was unlikely to change. Failure to abide by the terms of the treatment plan and continuing inappropriate conduct were sufficient to warrant termination of parental rights. In re E.D., N.T., & M.S., 2008 MT 216, 344 M 228, 186 P3d 1283 (2008).

Failure to Apply Proper Statutory Criteria in Termination Proceedings — Reversible Error: Instead of applying the statutory criteria in this section when considering whether to terminate a mother's parental rights, the District Court relied on the legal presumption in 41-3-604 that because the children had been in foster care for 15 of the prior 22 months, termination was appropriate. The Supreme Court reversed. A parent's right to the care and custody of a child is a fundamental liberty interest that must be protected by fundamentally fair procedures. The legal presumption in 41-3-604 alone is not a sufficient basis to terminate parental rights and neither eliminates the substantive requirements in this section nor diminishes the clear and convincing burden of proof on the party seeking to terminate parental rights. By relying on the presumption in 41-3-604, the District Court impermissibly shifted the burden of proof to the mother by concluding that there was insufficient evidence to rebut the presumption. It was not the mother's duty to rebut the presumption, but rather the state's burden to show that the mother failed to complete a treatment plan and that the mother's conduct or condition was unlikely to change within a reasonable time. Because the District Court applied the wrong statutory standards, the order terminating parental rights was reversed and the case was remanded for application of the proper statutory criteria. In re D.B. & D.B., 2007 MT 246, 339 M 240, 168 P3d 691 (2007).

Lower Court Finding That Mother's Inability to Parent Unlikely to Change Within Reasonable Period of Time Upheld: The appellant argued that the lower court erred in terminating her parental rights because the facts demonstrated that she was making progress toward making the changes required by her treatment plan. The Supreme Court held that the appellant's argument that she was making progress failed to address the relevant issue of whether she would make the necessary changes within a reasonable time and therefore the appellant had failed to meet her burden of showing that the lower court's findings were clearly erroneous. In re D. F., 2007 MT 147, 337 M 461, 161 P3d 825 (2007).

Mother Allowed to Challenge Trial Court's Findings Respecting Her Treatment Plan Resulting in Termination of Her Parental Rights: The appellant did not object to any of the procedures followed in the lower court proceedings concerning the termination of her parental rights but did argue that the trial court erred in rendering its factual findings. The Supreme Court stated that parental rights are a fundamental liberty interest that must be protected by fundamentally fair procedures and that the lower court's finding of fact were subject to review as to whether the findings were clearly erroneous. The trial court found that the appellant had performed some of the requirements of the treatment plan but had failed to meet other parts, including urinalysis testing. The lower court ruled that in failing to perform all required tasks, the appellant had failed to achieve the overall changes contemplated by the treatment plan. The Supreme Court rejected the appellant's argument that the Supreme Court could excuse noncompliance with any particular aspect of the treatment plan and held that the lower court was correct in finding that the treatment plan had not been fully complied with and that therefore the mother's parental rights should be terminated. In re D. F., 2007 MT 147, 337 M 461, 161 P3d 825 (2007).

Parent's Continued Drug Use Unlikely to Change — Parental Rights Properly Terminated: Facts presented at the termination hearing showed that although the mother successfully completed inpatient drug treatment, maintained sobriety for a time, and was moving toward successful completion of her treatment plan, she relapsed and began using methamphetamine again, and the use continued until the termination hearing. Additionally, she had numerous probation violations, the violations were increasing, she failed to maintain employment, and she had no plan for supporting herself or her child. The child had also been in foster care for more than 17 months, but rather than make every effort to maintain her sobriety so that she could parent her child, the mother's relapses continued. The District Court concluded that despite all the available resources, the mother's addiction was stronger than her desire to remain sober and parent her child and that the condition or conduct rendering the mother unfit to parent was unlikely to change within a reasonable time. The mother's parental rights were properly terminated. In re A.S., 2006 MT 281, 334 M 280, 146 P3d 778 (2006).

Conclusion That Parent's Conduct Unlikely to Change Based on Three Failed Treatment Plans — Parental Rights Properly Terminated: Following termination of a mother's parental rights, she appealed on grounds that the District Court's finding that her conduct was unlikely to change within a reasonable time was clearly erroneous based on her recent sobriety and the opinions of counselors that she could overcome her drug addiction. The Supreme Court held that the finding was not clearly erroneous because it was founded on the mother's well-documented drug history and the fact that the District Court had witnessed her fail three different court-approved treatment plans because of continuing drug use. The evidence that finding that her conduct was unlikely to change within a reasonable time was substantial and not misapprehended, and the District Court properly acted in the best interests of the children. Termination of the mother's parental rights was affirmed. In re B.B. & J.B., 2006 MT 66, 331 M 407, 133 P3d 215 (2006).

History of Treatment Plan Noncompliance — Termination Despite Recent Efforts to Comply: A mother's parental rights were terminated after the District Court found that her unfitness was unlikely to change within a reasonable time. The mother appealed, asserting that the court had erred by relying on past conduct when she had made recent progress in her rehabilitation efforts. The Supreme Court noted that a District Court must assess both past and present conduct and that the decision to terminate parental rights must to some extent be based on a parent's past conduct. In this case, experts testified that the mother had chronic disabilities that precluded her from parenting adequately and that despite efforts to help her learn necessary skills through parenting and anger management classes, she exhibited an inability to implement the lessons. Although the mother had made some progress, the District Court did not err in finding that her conduct was unlikely to change within a reasonable time and in subsequently terminating her parental rights. In re A.J.E., 2006 MT 41, 331 M 198, 130 P3d 612 (2006).

Total Treatment Plan Compliance Required — Termination Based on Parent's Lack of Responsibility for Conduct Affirmed: A parent contested termination of parental rights, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Uncontested findings showed that the parent did not satisfy the requirement for complete compliance with a treatment plan. Testimony regarding failure of the parent to take responsibility for continued consumption of alcohol and other behaviors and actions constituted substantial evidence that the parent's conduct or condition was unlikely to change within a reasonable time. The District Court did not abuse its discretion in terminating parental rights. In re T.L. & K.L., 2005 MT 256, 329 M 58, 122 P3d 453 (2005).

Inability of Parent to Relieve Child of Problems Associated With Pathological Parenting Within Reasonable Time — Parental Rights Properly Terminated: A mother admittedly failed to comply with two treatment plans established to deal with her child's serious attachment and behavioral disorder caused by long-term pathological parenting, but she took issue with the District Court's finding that the condition rendering her unfit was unlikely to change within a reasonable time. Upon review, the Supreme Court affirmed termination of the mother's parental rights. The state made reasonable efforts to assist the mother in completing the treatment plans, including referrals and payment for a variety of services, and gave the mother an adequate opportunity to address the problems that prevented her from adequately parenting her child. However, the mother failed to provide sufficient evidence showing what had changed that would now cause her to complete her treatment in a reasonable time. Thus, the District Court properly concluded that the conduct or conditions rendering the mother unfit to parent were unlikely to change within a reasonable time and did not abuse its discretion in terminating her parental rights. In re R.T., 2005 MT 173, 327 M 498, 116 P3d 783 (2005).

Appropriateness of Treatment Plans Recommending Parent Seek Treatment for Diagnosed and Undiagnosed Mental Disorders: The Supreme Court has not established a precise test by which to determine whether a particular treatment plan is appropriate, but one factor to be considered is whether a treatment plan addresses the particular circumstances facing both the parent and child. Here, the mother contended that her second and third treatment plans were inappropriate because they required that she obtain treatment for bipolar disorder, for which she had not been formally diagnosed, and because the plans failed to address her posttraumatic stress disorder, for which she had been diagnosed, and to recommend treatment for that condition. The Supreme Court noted that the mother herself testified that she had bipolar disorder and that the treatment plan required that she seek treatment for bipolar disorder and any other condition for which she had been diagnosed. Thus, the treatment plans appropriately covered both disorders, and because the mother failed to successfully comply with the treatment requirements or challenge the other relevant findings, her parental rights were properly terminated. In re D.G. & R.G., 2005 MT 139, 327 M 266, 114 P3d 201 (2005).

Failure of Parent to Meet With Professionals, Conduct Visits With Children, Live Independently, and Address Codependency Issues — Parental Rights Properly Terminated: A mother failed to comply with treatment plan requirements that she attend AlAnon meetings, meet with her social worker, attend visits with her children, detail how she would deal with a seizure by one of her children, live independently and not fall back into abusive relationships that put her children at risk, not allow anyone to reside in her home without approval, and address codependency issues and recognize the risks to her children and herself from associating with people under the influence of alcohol or drugs. This evidence was sufficient to show that the mother failed to comply with the treatment plans and, coupled with evidence that her conduct was unlikely to change within a reasonable time, was sufficient to warrant termination of the mother's parental rights. In re A.A. & D.A., 2005 MT 119, 327 M 127, 112 P3d 993 (2005), followed in In re L.H., 2007 MT 70, 336 M 405, 154 P3d 622 (2007).

Failure to Timely Object to Appropriateness of Parental Treatment Plan — Waiver of Right to Object: A mother contended that certain requirements of her treatment plans were inappropriate and should not have been considered in terminating her parental rights. However, the mother was represented by counsel at all stages of the matter, including negotiation of the treatment plans, and with advice of counsel agreed to three of the four plans. By failing to object to the treatment plan requirements in a timely manner, the mother waived the argument that portions of the plans were inappropriate. The Supreme Court declined to hold the District Court in error for an action to which the mother acquiesced. In re A.A. & D.A., 2005 MT 119, 327 M 127, 112 P3d 993 (2005).

Complete Treatment Plan Compliance Required — Sufficient Evidence to Support Termination of Parental Rights: Following termination of her parental rights, the mother argued that her minor noncompliance with her treatment plans did not render her an unfit parent. The Supreme Court noted that complete compliance with a treatment plan is required and that substantial or partial compliance is insufficient to prove a parent's fitness or responsibility. Here, the evidence showed that the mother had a long history of choosing drugs over her children and that she either suffered from serious medical problems or was exaggerating the problems in order to claim that she was not capable of securing gainful employment. The District Court refused to accept the mother's claim that she was too disabled to work but was still capable of parenting a young child on a full-time basis, and the Supreme Court affirmed. In re V.F.A., 2005 MT 76, 326 M 383, 109 P3d 749 (2005), followed in In re O.A.W., 2007 MT 13, 335 M 304, 153 P3d 6 (2007). See also In re D.V., 2003 MT 160, 316 M 282, 70 P3d 1253 (2003).

Parent's Inability to Comply With Treatment Plan or Remain Drug-Free — Parental Rights Properly Terminated: Although it was a condition of a mother's treatment plan that she attend parenting classes and remain drug-free, she failed to participate in classes for 7 months and during a 6-month period, she had five positive tests and failed to show up for 16 drug tests, which were also considered failed tests. The District Court concluded that the mother's conduct was unlikely to change within a reasonable time. On appeal, the Supreme Court agreed. Because a court cannot see into the future to determine whether a parent's conduct is likely to change, that determination must to some extent be based on the parent's past conduct. The mother admitted that she was addicted to methamphetamine, and given her consistent inability to remain drug-free, the District Court did not err in finding that the condition rendering the mother unfit to parent was unlikely to change within a reasonable time. Termination of parental rights was affirmed. In re Custody & Parental Rights of C.J.K., 2005 MT 67, 326 M 289, 109 P3d 232 (2005).

Treatment Plan Not Inappropriate — Completion Required: The mother was required to complete a treatment plan. Merely going through the motions but refusing to internalize the lessons and apply them to her own situation was not sufficient compliance. The inclusion in the mother's treatment plan of factors appropriate to a sexual offender based on the misdiagnosis of sexual assault was harmless error, and the mother was not required to complete that portion of the treatment plan. The mother's failure to complete other factors was sufficient to support the District Court's finding that the mother failed to complete the treatment plan. The father's incarceration was not an excuse for failure to complete the required evaluations. Requiring the evaluations as part of the father's treatment plans while he was incarcerated was not inappropriate. In re D.B., 2004 MT 371, 325 M 13, 103 P3d 1026 (2004).

Failure of Mother to Understand Children's Needs in Wake of Father's Incest — Termination Proper: A critical objective of the mother's treatment plan was to achieve an empathetic understanding of her children's needs in the wake of their sexual abuse by their father, yet witness testimony, documentary evidence, and information in the court file showed that the mother often appeared skeptical regarding the children's truthfulness concerning the abuse and was disruptive and antagonistic in Department-sponsored meetings with the children. The mother clearly failed to achieve this critical goal, and subsequent termination of her parental rights was proper based on her failure to comply with the treatment plan. Further, given the mother's long history of disregarding the children's needs, her ongoing exposure of the children to unreasonable risk, and her continued failure to protect them, there was sufficient evidence that her ability to parent was unlikely to change within a reasonable time. The statutory criteria for termination of the mother's parental rights was adequately considered, and termination was affirmed. In re M.B., J.B., & W.B., 2004 MT 304, 323 M 468, 100 P3d 1006 (2004).

Failure to Complete Court-Approved Treatment Plan Grounds for Termination of Parental Rights: The District Court terminated a father's parental rights for failing to comply with a treatment plan. The father contended that the court failed to approve the plan offered by the Department. However, the record showed that the court indeed approved the plan and ordered the father to complete it and that the father stipulated to the fact that the Department had offered a treatment plan, confirmed the stipulation at the termination hearing, and testified to the fact that he had been ordered to complete the plan. Termination of the father's parental rights based on failure to complete the treatment plan was affirmed. In re M.B., J.B., & W.B., 2004 MT 304, 323 M 468, 100 P3d 1006 (2004).

Consideration of Parent's Mental Disability in Determining Whether Conduct Likely to Change — No Violation of Americans With Disabilities Act: A mother contended that she should have been granted additional time to comply with her treatment plan because of her mental disability and that failure to grant more time violated the federal Americans With Disabilities Act of 1990 (ADA). The Supreme Court declined to address the applicability of the ADA to parental termination proceedings because the District Court did in fact consider the mother's disability in determining that her inability to parent was unlikely to change within a reasonable time. Thus, the criteria for termination of parental rights were properly considered, and because the mother failed to establish that the statutory criteria were not met, termination was affirmed. In re J.B.K. & J.T.K., 2004 MT 202, 322 M 286, 95 P3d 699 (2004), followed in In re M.H. & G.H., 2006 MT 208, 333 M 286, 143 P3d 103 (2006).

Unsuccessful Treatment Plan, Remedial Services, and Rehabilitative Program — Indian Parental Rights Properly Terminated: The District Court terminated the parental rights of an Indian mother. On appeal, the mother contended that the court's determination that the child would suffer serious emotional or physical damage if the child was returned to her was not proved beyond a reasonable doubt. The Supreme Court noted that state law requires successful completion of a parenting plan and that the federal Indian Child Welfare Act requires that active efforts be made to provide remedial services and rehabilitative programs to prevent the breakup of an Indian family, but that in this case, both the state and federal measures proved unsuccessful. The District Court received substantial testimony from qualified cultural and other experts upon which it could conclude beyond a reasonable doubt that the prospect of the mother providing primary care was likely to subject the child to serious harm, so the mother's parental rights were properly terminated. In re M.R.G., 2004 MT 172, 322 M 60, 97 P3d 1085 (2004).

Fundamental Liberty Interest Recognized in Fundamentally Fair Procedures for Termination of Parental Rights — Credibility of Witnesses Within Discretion of Trial Court: The District Court terminated a father's parental rights for failure to comply with or complete a treatment plan, including successful completion of an anger management program. On appeal, the father contended that the District Court: (1) failed to acknowledge a parent's fundamental right to the care and custody of a child: (2) gave greater credence to the testimony of the child than that of the father; (3) incorrectly found that the father had not successfully completed the anger management program; and (4) failed to consider the testimony of the father's therapist. The Supreme Court considered the arguments and affirmed. Although the District Court did not specifically address the fundamental liberty interest, the court did protect the liberty interest by following fundamentally fair statutory procedures. Further, although the father did complete all the anger management classes, he was unable to admit that he had an anger problem or demonstrate changes in his behavior after taking the program. Last, it was within the discretion of the District Court to weigh the credibility of the witnesses, and the Supreme Court declined to reweigh the evidence absent an abuse of that discretion. In re J.C.B. & L.E.C., 2004 MT 111, 321 M 110, 88 P3d 1280 (2004).

District Court Not Limited to Consideration of Only Physical Neglect in Termination of Parental Rights: The final petition for termination of a mother's parental rights specifically cited physical neglect as its basis, and the mother contended that the District Court was thus barred from considering any evidence beyond physical neglect, such as psychological abuse, as demonstrated by the living conditions in her home. The District Court did not rule on the issue, but simply made the underlying findings necessary to terminate the mother's parental rights. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Although it may have been better if the final petition had listed other grounds, it is proper for the state to consider other causes of abuse and neglect during proceedings because the purpose of the proceedings is to protect the child. The final petition also cited failure to comply with the treatment plan as another basis for termination. The treatment plan addressed the mother's psychological issues related to her parenting skills, so the mother was clearly on notice that psychological issues could be considered. Based on the record, parental rights were properly terminated because the mother failed to comply with the treatment plan, she was unable to properly and consistently parent her children by understanding and meeting each of their needs, her conduct was unlikely to change within a reasonable time relevant to the developmental needs of the children, and termination was in the best interests of the children. In re J.G., C.G., & M.G.-E., 2004 MT 104, 321 M 54, 89 P3d 11 (2004).

Partial Attempts to Rehabilitate and Comply With Treatment Plan Compared to History of Noncompliance — Finding of Unlikelihood of Fitness Within Reasonable Time Affirmed: A mother did not contest that her children had been adjudicated in need of care or that she had failed to comply with her treatment plan, but did assert an insufficiency of evidence that she was unlikely to become a fit parent within a reasonable time. The District Court compared the mother's partial attempts to comply with her treatment plan in the 3 months preceding the hearing to her history of noncompliance over the course of 17 months and concluded that, taken as a whole, it was unlikely that the mother would become a fit parent within a reasonable time. Noting that evidence of rehabilitation on the part of a parent is germane to the issue of that parent's ability to care for a child in the future but does not render a District Court powerless to find future danger to the child, the Supreme Court found no error in the determination that despite some evidence of rehabilitation, the conduct rendering the mother unfit was unlikely to change within a reasonable time. Termination of parental rights was affirmed. In re J.C. & R.B., 2003 MT 369, 319 M 112, 82 P3d 900 (2003).

Complete Compliance With Treatment Plan Required: Substantial or partial compliance with a treatment plan is insufficient to prove that a person is prepared to be a fit or responsible parent. The District Court did not err when it found that, despite the fact that a mother completed a chemical dependency evaluation, the condition rendering her unfit was unlikely to change in a reasonable time because she made minimal efforts to comply with a treatment plan by failing to consistently submit to random drug testing, failed to submit verification of attendance at required meetings, did not attend individual counseling and psychiatric appointments, neglected to take prescribed medications, and failed to maintain a healthy relationship with her children by maintaining frequent and consistent contact. In re S.H. & B.H., 2003 MT 366, 319 M 90, 86 P3d 1027 (2003).

No Abuse of Discretion in Giving More Weight to Testimony of Guardian Ad Litem Than Parent: In determining the best interests of the children, the District Court relied more on the testimony of a guardian ad litem than on that of the mother. The mother contended that the guardian's testimony was highly prejudicial and based on hearsay, violated her due process rights, and lowered the state's burden of proof. She also contended that the statute that allowed the guardian's testimony was unconstitutional. Without reaching the issue of constitutionality, the Supreme Court affirmed. The District Court did not rely on the guardian's testimony in determining whether the mother complied with her treatment plan or whether her unfitness was likely to change within a reasonable time. Those criteria were established by other testimony, so the District Court did not abuse its discretion in terminating the mother's parental rights. In re S.H. & B.H., 2003 MT 366, 319 M 90, 86 P3d 1027 (2003).

Sufficient Evidence of Failure to Comply With or Complete Six Treatment Plans — Parental Rights Properly Terminated: A mother of four children had six court-approved treatment plans over several years. The most recent plan included a provision that the mother not see the father of two of the children. Nevertheless, the two continued their relationship, which culminated in removal of the children following a violent domestic disturbance. The state sought to terminate the mother's parental rights, and despite the mother's contention that she had made some progress on the treatment plans, the District Court terminated her parental rights. The Supreme Court affirmed. There was sufficient evidence that the mother continued her drug use, did not submit timely drug tests, missed meetings and counseling sessions, was belligerent, failed to maintain a job or provide stable income, missed the children's medical, dental, counseling, and day-care appointments, and failed to maintain a home apart from the children's father or deal effectively with that relationship. Absent evidence that conditions were likely to change within a reasonable time, parental rights were properly terminated. In re T.J.H., J.H., J.L., & A.L., 2003 MT 352, 318 M 528, 81 P3d 504 (2003).

No Demonstration of Mental Stability Necessary to Parent High-Needs Children — Parental Rights Properly Terminated: The last two court-approved treatment plans established four goals for the mother: (1) address her mental health issues; (2) establish a stable, consistent, and safe environment for the children; (3) address the children's mental health needs; and (4) establish a healthy relationship with the children and effectively parent. The District Court found that the mother failed to comply with the treatment plan and terminated her parental rights. The mother appealed on grounds that she was complying with the terms of the treatment plan, but the Supreme Court affirmed. To successfully complete the plan, the mother needed to demonstrate that she would no longer become overwhelmed with the stresses of her life, which she failed to do. After receiving services under various social programs, she would show improvement for a time but invariably relapsed into her previous way of doing things as she became overwhelmed. She missed meetings and was likely to return to the lifestyle that gave rise to the proceedings. She failed to comply with the plan because she denied the state access to her mental health care providers. Most importantly, she did not demonstrate sufficient mental ability to be able to parent her high-needs children. Parental rights were properly terminated. In re C.H., S.H., & D.H., 2003 MT 308, 318 M 208, 79 P3d 822 (2003).

Failure to Meet Department Treatment Plan — Rights Terminated:

Substantial evidence supported the District Court's conclusion that the mother did not comply with all of the tasks and goals of her treatment plan and that the conduct or condition rendering her unable to adequately parent her children was not likely to change in a reasonable time. The District Court properly resolved any conflicting evidence and terminated the mother's parental rights. In re A.F. & A.C., 2003 MT 254, 317 M 367, 77 P3d 266 (2003).

A family preservation treatment plan listed four goals: (1) a plan for reunification; (2) a safety plan for the children; (3) timelines; and (4) a backup plan, including concurrent placement. The parents acknowledged that they did not comply with the goal of completing tasks within the established timelines, and the Department had been working with the parents for more than a year to get them to complete the treatment plans in order to reunify the family. Safety and cleanliness goals were not met, and psychological profiles of the parents indicated a lack of ability to provide a safe and appropriate home environment for their young children. There was little evidence that the condition rendering the parents unfit was likely to change within a reasonable time. The parents' compliance with the various treatment plans was characterized by a pattern of increasing their efforts as hearings approached and then slipping back into their previous behavior patterns. The statutory criteria for terminating parental rights was met, and the District Court did not err in doing so. The parents' contention of District Court error in finding that the mother had lost custody of another child because of her inability to parent, which was unsupported in the record, did not constitute grounds for dismissal because the error would have had no significant impact on the result and was therefore harmless. In re C.B. & J.B., 2001 MT 42, 304 M 252, 20 P3d 117 (2001).

Findings of fact that were applied in terminating mother's parental rights were not clearly erroneous. She had failed to comply with and successfully complete two treatment plans, and conditions making her unfit as a parent, including chronic alcoholism, were unlikely to change within a reasonable time. In re W.Z., 285 M 16, 946 P2d 125, 54 St. Rep. 1019 (1997).

The children of Kevin and Toni were adjudicated "youths in need of care", and a court-approved treatment plan was established. More than a year after the plan was established, the District Court found that neither Kevin nor Toni had successfully completed the plan and that neither was likely to complete the plan within a reasonable time. The District Court found that neither parent had maintained weekly contact with a social worker, neither obtained a parenting assessment and evaluation, and for some time, neither complied with the requirement that each submit to random drug and alcohol urinalysis. When Toni did comply, she tested positive for cocaine use three times. Both Kevin and Toni failed to comply with the treatment plan when they failed to report their incarceration to a social worker. Additionally, Kevin and Toni together and Toni individually at times lived in one bedroom apartments that were not suitable for their children, even though the treatment plan required them to maintain a home suitable for the children. The record also showed that the children had not been attending school, the parents had taught the children how to shoplift, and neither parent had returned to Montana to work on regaining custody or to visit the children. For these reasons, the Supreme Court held that the District Court did not err in finding that Kevin and Toni failed to complete their treatment plan and did not err in terminating Kevin and Toni's parental rights. In re B.C., 283 M 423, 941 P2d 106, 54 St. Rep. 690 (1997).

The state showed by clear and convincing evidence that the statutory criteria for termination of parental rights had been met when proof was offered in evidence of mother's failure to: (1) obtain a valid driver's license; (2) successfully complete parenting classes; and (3) make weekly contacts with her social worker. When combined with maternal grandmother's testimony as to abuse, neglect, and exposure to alcohol and drugs, mother's parental rights were properly terminated. In re N.R.M., 261 M 502, 862 P2d 1171, 50 St. Rep. 1428 (1993).

The county Department of Family Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) developed a three-phase plan designed to reunite a mother with her children. The goal of phase one was to restore the mother's mental and emotional health and capability to a level sufficient to enable her to conduct herself in a manner that would make it reasonable for mental health professionals to believe her likely to function responsibly as an adult, parent, and homemaker. Phase two called for the mother to maintain the stability established in the first phase. Phase three was to attempt to restore full custody of the children to the mother through reintegration into the mother's home. Although progress was apparent under the first two phases, failure to achieve the third phase was sufficient to warrant relinquishment of parental rights. In re A.H., T.H., & J.A.H., 236 M 323, 769 P2d 1245, 46 St. Rep. 395 (1989).

Failure to Adjudicate Youth in Need of Care Precluding Termination of Parental Rights: A parent contended that parental rights were improperly terminated because the child was not properly adjudicated as a youth in need of care. The Supreme Court noted that such adjudication is a threshold requirement before a court may grant temporary legal custody, order a parental treatment plan, or terminate parental rights. The state argued that the child was found to be a youth in need of care during earlier guardianship proceedings in a different District Court. The Supreme Court cited In re F.M., 2002 MT 180, 311 M 35, 53 P3d 368 (2002), for the holding that evidence received at a hearing on a collateral matter, such as a guardianship proceeding, did not satisfy the adjudicatory requirements of 41-3-404 (renumbered 41-3-437). Further, it was improper for the District Court to approve a treatment plan 10 months prior to proper adjudication of the child as a youth in need of care, in violation of 41-3-420 (renumbered 41-3-443) and this section (formerly numbered 41-3-406), which also rendered the requirements of 41-3-609 unsatisfied. Because the child was not properly adjudicated a youth in need of care, court approval of a treatment plan was improper and termination of parental rights was reversed. In re B.N.Y., 2003 MT 241, 317 M 291, 77 P3d 189 (2003).

Children in Foster Care for Years Coupled With Failure to Comply With Treatment Plan — Parental Rights Properly Terminated: At least three experts testified that the mother failed to comply with a treatment plan. This fact, coupled with the fact that the children were adjudicated youths in need of care and had been in foster care for more than 15 of the most recent 22 months, was sufficient to terminate the mother's parental rights. In re K.S., D.S., & C.S., 2003 MT 212, 317 M 88, 75 P3d 325 (2003).

Finding That Continuing Parental Relationship Would Cause Child Serious Emotional and Physical Damage — Rights Properly Terminated: Termination of parental rights based on a District Court finding that a child's continued relationship with the father would likely cause the child serious emotional and physical damage, applying the best interests of the child standard, was supported by substantial credible evidence, was not an abuse of discretion, and was affirmed. In re D.V., 2003 MT 160, 316 M 282, 70 P3d 1253 (2003).

Completion of Five of Six Treatment Plan Elements — Improper Termination of Parental Rights of Incarcerated Parent: Although the state was aware that the father was incarcerated and would remain so during the schedule incorporated in a treatment plan, the state did not invoke subsection (4)(c) of this section, which provides that a treatment plan is not required for an incarcerated parent, but relied instead on subsection (1)(f) of this section, which allows termination of parental rights upon failure of the parent to comply with a treatment plan. The treatment plan here required the incarcerated parent to maintain a chemically free lifestyle, establish a consistent and stable lifestyle, and establish a safe environment and a healthy relationship with the children. The residential and employment requirements proved inapplicable because the parent was incarcerated, but the parent completed five of the six remaining applicable tasks related to maintenance of a chemically free lifestyle. However, development of a treatment plan with the knowledge that the parent would be incarcerated during the plan's applicable period, requiring compliance with the plan, and then terminating parental rights because incarceration rendered the plan unsuccessful did not constitute a good faith effort by the state to preserve the parent-child relationship and the family unit. Thus, it was erroneous to terminate the parental rights in this case, and the Supreme Court ordered vacation of the portion of the District Court's order that terminated the incarcerated parent's rights. In re A.T. & J.T., 2003 MT 154, 316 M 255, 70 P3d 1247 (2003).

Failure to Comply With Treatment Plan Requirement for Provision of Stable Home With Adequate Housing and Income — Parental Rights Properly Terminated: A mother relinquished custody of her three children after the District Court determined that the children were in need of care. When she became pregnant again, the state moved for emergency protective services for the fourth child upon its birth. When the state moved to terminate the father's parental rights based on failure to comply with two treatment plans, the father contended that because the child was removed from the parents at birth, it was never abused or neglected and thus could not properly have been adjudicated as a youth in need of care. Because 41-3-443 requires that an adequate treatment plan must identify the problems or conditions that resulted in abuse or neglect, the father asserted that the treatment plans were not adequate because the child was not abused or neglected. The Supreme Court disagreed. Because the mother as primary caregiver could not provide for the children, the onus was on the father to provide a safe environment for the new child. Both treatment plans required that the father provide a stable home for the child with adequate housing and income, but the father could provide no evidence of substantial compliance with either plan, being unable to secure either a residence or a job. Thus, the District Court did not err in determining that both elements of this section were present and in terminating the father's parental rights. In re K.C.H., 2003 MT 125, 316 M 13, 68 P3d 788 (2003).

Parent's Mental Illness, Emotional Problems, and Limited Intellectual Functioning Unlikely to Change Within Reasonable Time — Parental Rights Properly Terminated: Because of a mother's serious mental problems, emotional problems, and limited intellectual functioning, she was unable to make sufficient improvement to allow her to safely parent her children, so the District Court terminated her parental rights. The mother appealed. The Supreme Court noted the fundamental liberty interest of a parent's right to the care and custody of a child, but affirmed the termination based on substantial credible evidence that there was little chance that, despite the mother's love for her children, the mother's condition was likely to change within a reasonable time or that parenting would become easier as the children grew older, given the mother's intellectual deficits that would not improve with age. In re S.C., M.J., C.C., & K.C., 2003 MT 93, 315 M 188, 68 P3d 685 (2003).

Failure to Stop Drinking and Complete Chemical Dependency Counseling During Treatment Plan Period — Chemical Dependency and Antisocial Personality Disorder Unlikely to Change — Parental Rights Terminated: A father entered into successive treatment plans wherein he agreed to complete chemical dependency testing and counseling, attend parenting classes, contact a social worker on a weekly basis, and maintain visitation with his child in accordance with the recommendations of the child's counselor. However, the father did not stop drinking or follow through with chemical dependency counseling during the treatment plan period. The father pointed out that he and a woman with whom he was living successfully parented his biological child and two other children for 2 years prior to the termination hearing, demonstrating that his antisocial disorder and alcoholism did not preclude him from parenting. The Supreme Court was not impressed, noting that the woman's parenting ability did not compensate for the father's unwillingness to address his chemical dependency and the fact that he never established a meaningful relationship with his child. Although counselors testified that the father could address his problems through intensive therapy, the father's conduct was unlikely to change within a reasonable time, and his parental rights were properly terminated. In re J.V., S.V., T.V., & M.V., 2003 MT 68, 314 M 487, 67 P3d 242 (2003).

Pressure of Full-Time Employment Combined With Fragile Mental Health Making Demands of Parenting Insurmountable — Parental Rights Properly Terminated: After the mother failed to comply with a second parenting plan, the District Court terminated her parental rights. The mother appealed on grounds that she had made significant strides during the treatment plan period, addressing her chronic depression with medication and psychological counseling, securing gainful employment, and locating affordable housing. Nevertheless, the court's findings that financial and psychological problems continued to adversely impact her ability to care for her children and the likelihood that the conditions were unlikely to change within a reasonable time were not clearly erroneous. Testimony from community social workers confirmed that the pressures of full-time employment, combined with the mother's fragile mental health, made insurmountable the demands of parenting children with special needs. Parental rights were properly terminated. In re J.V., S.V., T.V., & M.V., 2003 MT 68, 314 M 487, 67 P3d 242 (2003).

Unlikely Change in Conduct and Failure to Complete Treatment Plan Within Two Years Warranting Termination of Parental Rights: Considering the District Court's unchallenged and sufficiently supported findings regarding the father's failure to complete any portion of a treatment plan within 2 years, the Supreme Court held that the District Court's finding that the father's ability to parent was not likely to change within a reasonable time was not in error. Termination of the father's parental rights was affirmed. In re L.S., 2003 MT 12, 314 M 42, 63 P3d 497 (2003).

Failure to Complete Treatment Plan Within Eighteen Months — Unfit Conduct Unlikely to Change — Termination of Parental Rights Proper: The District Court terminated the mother's parental rights. The mother argued on appeal that the court's finding that she was unlikely to complete a treatment plan and that the condition rendering her unfit was unlikely to change was erroneous because she was leading a stable, child-centered life in Wyoming. However, that argument ignored contrary testimony from a clinical psychologist, a therapist, and a social worker that she had not completed any of her treatment plans and had essentially refused to obtain mental health and alcohol counseling. The Supreme Court held that the fact that the mother had not completed a treatment plan within 18 months indicated that she was unlikely to complete one within a reasonable time and that the conduct rendering her unfit was also unlikely to change within a reasonable time; therefore, termination of her parental rights was affirmed. In re Custody & Parental Rights of M.A.D. & C.D., 2003 MT 10, 314 M 38, 62 P3d 717 (2003).

Admitted Failure to Complete Treatment Plan by Father With Serious Mental Illness — Termination of Parental Rights Without Visitation Upheld: The lower court's determination that the father did not complete his treatment plan was supported by the father's admission that he did not complete it, and his partial compliance with the plan was not sufficient. The testimony of the father and his psychologist and the father's conduct supported the lower court's determination that he had bipolar disorder and severe mental illness, making him unfit to parent, and that his parental rights should be terminated and he should be denied visitation with the children. In re N.A., B.A., & A.A., 2002 MT 303, 313 M 27, 59 P3d 1135 (2002).

Adequate Showing of Failure to Complete Treatment Plans — Termination of Parental Rights Not Improper: Despite testimony that the mother was a loving parent struggling against incredible odds to parent her children, it was not error for the District Court to terminate her parental rights after the children had been in state custody for 22 of the preceding 26 months and after the court found that she did not complete court-approved treatment plans, failed to remain drug-free and alcohol-free and to complete chemical dependency treatment, failed to participate regularly in her own individual therapy, did not consistently attend family therapy with her children, was unwilling to work consistently on parenting skills, did not terminate her relationship with a partner who abused one of the children, and failed to work consistently with a psychiatric nurse practitioner to monitor her medication needs. In re Custody of D.T., T.D., & B.D., 2002 MT 232, 311 M 463, 56 P3d 859 (2002).

Parental Rights Terminated Despite Parent's Contention That No Treatment Plan in Effect: A mother successfully completed two treatment plans, and her three children were returned to her care. A few months later, officials at the children's Jefferson County school notified the Department of Public Health and Human Services that the children had hitchhiked 12 miles into town to get to school on at least four occasions and had already missed 8 days of school. The children were placed in foster care, and the Department filed for temporary legal custody. A treatment plan was developed in Jefferson County in December 2000, but in January 2001, the mother informed the Department that she was moving to Lewis and Clark County. She was instructed to establish a suitable home in Lewis and Clark County and to continue working on the treatment objectives while awaiting transfer of the case between counties. About 2 months later, the mother was arrested for operating a methamphetamine lab in her apartment. The children were adjudicated youths in need of care, and the mother's parental rights were terminated about 8 months later. She appealed on grounds that she never actually had a treatment plan during the 6 months preceding the termination and that the Department should have designed a treatment plan that she could have completed during her incarceration. The Supreme Court disagreed. The December 2000 treatment plan was to be in effect for 180 days, but it was the mother who determined the shortness of the plan by participating in dangerous criminal activity. Although a new treatment plan was not yet developed in Lewis and Clark County, the Jefferson County plan was still in effect. The District Court correctly concluded that the mother did not comply with or successfully complete the court-approved treatment plan and was unlikely to make significant progress within a reasonable time to meet the children's needs. Parental rights were properly terminated. In re Custody of A.L.R., A.A.R., & T.C.R., 2002 MT 183, 311 M 76, 54 P3d 17 (2002).

Violation of Treatment Plan Requiring No Contact Between Parents — Parental Rights Terminated: One condition of a treatment plan required the mother to refrain from contact with the father because the relationship was destructive and abusive and posed a danger to the mother and the children. Nevertheless, the mother continued to maintain contact with the father throughout the case, going so far as to hide the contact and engage in a pattern of dishonesty with professionals involved in the case, who were unwilling to work with her because of her dishonesty. Although the mother was partly successful with some goals of the treatment plan, her dishonesty required appointment of an entirely new treatment team, making completion of the treatment plan within a reasonable time unworkable. Findings that the mother was unable to put her children's needs before her own, to meet the emotional needs of the children, to understand relationships that put the children at risk, and to refrain from contact with the father were sufficient to warrant termination of parental rights. In re F.M. & D.M., 2002 MT 180, 311 M 35, 53 P3d 368 (2002).

Past and Present Behavior Considered as Indication of Parental Fitness and Potential to Change — Failure to Provide Nurturing Environment: Over a 2-year period, a mother entered into four different treatment plans aimed at reunification with her children. A primary element of each plan was that she provide a safe and nurturing environment for the children, yet several planned reunifications were delayed, usually as a result of volatile altercations between the mother and her husband. The altercations traumatized the children, and the postponed reunifications disillusioned them. Because of the mother's propensity to enter abusive relationships, none of the treatment plans were successfully completed. Based on the mother's history, it was highly likely that she would continue with abusive relationships and remain unable to remove herself from violent relationships or establish a safe and nurturing environment for the children. Further, she exhausted all the services that were available to facilitate reunification, including individual counseling for the children and herself, chemical dependency counseling, parenting classes, couple's counseling, family intervention, and referral to emergency housing and counseling for women in domestic violence cycles, and even given additional time, no new services would become available. The state went well beyond the requirements of making reasonable efforts to provide reunification services available for the mother and family, but the efforts proved unsuccessful. Given the mother's history and unlikely ability to change, it was in the children's best interests to protect them from exposure to the chronic family violence and to terminate the mother's parental rights and grant permanent placement of the children with the state. Parent Facing Several Years of Incarceration Unlikely to Change Within Reasonable Time — Parental Rights Terminated: The father attempted to comply with a treatment plan for less than 2 months before being arrested and jailed on drug-related charges. By continuing his drug use, the father ruined his chances for a favorable plea agreement, and faced several years of incarceration. The District Court correctly concluded that the father's substance abuse problems were unlikely to change within a reasonable time and that he failed to successfully complete the court-ordered treatment plan, so his parental rights were properly terminated. In re A.L., A.L., & C.L., 2002 MT 169, 310 M 480, 51 P3d 1131 (2002).

Termination of Parental Rights Without Treatment Plan — Reversal Warranted When Two Doctors Not in Agreement That Inability to Parent Cannot Be Remedied Within Reasonable Time: This section allows the termination of parental rights without a treatment plan if two medical doctors or clinical psychologists agree that a person cannot assume the role of parent. In In re Baby Boy Scott, 235 M 253, 767 P2d 298 (1988), the Supreme Court added an additional requirement that the doctors must also testify that the condition of the parent is unlikely to change within a reasonable time. In the present case, the District Court terminated a father's parental rights without a treatment plan after one doctor testified that it would probably be decades before the father could assume the role of parent, while a second doctor testified that it would be difficult to determine a time because it depended on so many variables but that the father could theoretically assume the role of parent if given the opportunity to participate in an ongoing treatment plan with strict supervision and continuous monitoring by trained professionals. The Supreme Court held that it is insufficient for both doctors to agree merely that a person is currently unable to parent. Both must also agree that the condition making a parent unable to assume that role is unlikely to change within a reasonable time (see 2003 amendment). Here, the doctors were not in agreement regarding the likelihood of the father's condition to change, so the basic statutory requirements were not met, and the District Court improperly terminated the father's parental rights. In re C.R.O., 2002 MT 50, 309 M 48, 43 P3d 913 (2002).

No Error in Finding That Conduct Rendering Father Unfit Unlikely to Change — Parental Rights Properly Terminated: The father attempted to work through seven consecutive treatment plans over a 3-year period, all designed to address his admitted problems with drugs and alcohol, anger management and associated abuse and neglect issues, and to reunite him with his children. Nevertheless, the father continued to drink and use drugs despite the plans' prohibition on their use, refused urinalysis tests on eight different occasions, did not attend Alcoholics Anonymous as required, made death threats to social workers, and refused to allow social workers into his home, which ultimately resulted in termination of his parental rights. On appeal, it was not contested that the children had been adjudicated youths in need of care or that the father had not successfully completed the treatment plans, but the father did contest the District Court's finding that the conduct or condition rendering him unfit was unlikely to change within a reasonable time. The Supreme Court agreed with the father's assertions that he had made progress with positive life changes, but there was also evidence that the father would not be able to elevate his parenting abilities to a minimal standard in time to be developmentally beneficial to the children. There was no clear error in the District Court's finding that the conduct or condition rendering the father unfit was unlikely to change within a reasonable time, so the termination of parental rights was affirmed. In re T.A.G. & K.L.G., 2002 MT 4, 308 M 89, 39 P3d 686 (2002).

Petition to Terminate Parental Rights Properly Dismissed — Sufficient Evidence of Compliance With Treatment Plan: The District Court denied a petition to terminate a mother's parental rights and ordered her child returned to her within 30 days. The guardian ad litem appealed, contending that several of the court's findings were clearly erroneous and that the court had made findings without sufficient evidence and misapprehended the effect of the evidence. The Supreme Court affirmed. Although it stated that all of the treatment plan tasks had not been accomplished, the District Court was satisfied that the mother had substantially complied with her treatment plan as a whole, that the plan was successful, and that she could provide adequate care for her child. The District Court was thorough in its analysis, made findings pertaining to each goal in the plan, and summarized the completion of the treatment plan based on those findings. Although bonding issues remained, the District Court attributed the lack of bonding to the fact that the mother was living and working in Iowa while the child was in foster care in Montana, rather than to an inability to bond. The finding that the mother had substantially complied with the treatment plan was not clearly erroneous. In re B.B., 2001 MT 285, 307 M 379, 37 P3d 715 (2001).

No Bright Line Definition of Appropriate Treatment Plan: Because of the unique circumstances of each case, no bright line definition of what constitutes an appropriate treatment plan is possible. Factors routinely considered are: (1) whether the parent was represented by counsel; (2) whether the parent stipulated to the treatment plan; and (3) whether or not the treatment plan takes into consideration the particular problems facing both the parent and the child. It is, however, imperative that the process by which a treatment plan is implemented be fair. In re A.F.-C., 2001 MT 283, 307 M 358, 37 P3d 724 (2001). See also In re Custody & Parental Rights of M.M., 271 M 52, 894 P2d 298 (1995), and In re A.N. & C.N., 2000 MT 35, 298 M 237, 995 P2d 427 (2000).

Failure of Parents to Comply With Any of Five Different Treatment Plans — Child's Best Interests Paramount: To ensure the proper care of their sexually abused children, the state devised five different treatment plans for the parents over a 2-year period, but none of the plans were successful, so the state sought to terminate parental rights. The parents did not challenge the finding that their children were youths in need of care, but did challenge the appropriateness of the treatment plans, the finding that the plans were unsuccessful, and the finding that their conduct was unlikely to change within a reasonable time. The Supreme Court affirmed the termination. Primary consideration must be given to the best interests of the child as demonstrated by the child's physical, mental, and emotional conditions and needs, and the child's interests take precedence over parental rights. Here, the treatment plans were directed at protecting the children from further sexual abuse within the home and were thus appropriate. Although the parents complied with some obligations of the treatment plans, partial compliance is an insufficient basis upon which to premise error in a finding that a plan was not complied with. Further, a District Court should assess a parent's past and present conduct in determining whether that parent's conduct is unlikely to change within a reasonable time. In this case, ongoing incest between the siblings characterized the parents' inability to provide a safe environment to protect the younger children in the foreseeable future. The children had been in periodic foster care for several years, and numerous treatment plans were provided to the parents, who had considerable time to comply. The District Court did not abuse its discretion in terminating parental rights based on these findings of fact. In re D.H., S.H., K.H., N.S., & J.B., 2001 MT 200, 306 M 278, 33 P3d 616 (2001).

Admission of Letter Referencing Treatment Plan Not Arbitrary or Beyond Bounds of Reason — Parent's Claim of Illiteracy Questionable: In addition to presenting a revised treatment plan to the father when he was incarcerated, a state social worker sent the father's counsel a letter advising that unless the state heard otherwise, it would be assumed that counsel had no objections to the treatment plan. The letter also advised counsel of the father's claim of illiteracy. The state was not notified of any objections, and the District Court admitted the letter as evidence of a treatment plan. The father's subsequent motion to strike the treatment plan on grounds that the plan was not submitted to counsel prior to submission to the District Court and that the father could not read or write was denied. The Supreme Court affirmed. Based on the District Court's observations, the father's claim of illiteracy was questionable at best, and if there were objections to the treatment plan, presumably they would have been raised. The District Court did not err in relying on the treatment plan and in terminating the father's parental rights for completely failing to comply with the plan. In re R.F., 2001 MT 199, 306 M 270, 32 P3d 1257 (2001).

Mental or Emotional Illness Rendering Mother Unable to Parent Children Within Reasonable Time — Parental Rights Properly Terminated: A mother contended that her parental rights were improperly terminated based on evidence that she did not complete her parenting plan, including the therapy and visitation provisions of the plan. The family had two vehicles, but the mother did not attempt to take one when she left the father, failed to meet the requirement for weekly supervised visits, and maintained only sporadic contact with her children for almost a year. The therapy provisions of the treatment plan required the mother to obtain individual therapy and continue in therapy until she could demonstrate a clear understanding of how to protect her children from further emotional, physical, and sexual abuse and neglect, put that understanding into practice for at least 6 months, and address her own parenting issues, self-esteem, prior family history, signs of sexual abuse, and dependency on the children's father at the cost of her children's safety. The trial court noted that the mother could not have applied her therapy for 6 months as required because she had not had custody of the children since the plan was put into place. The court also found that the mother was not willing or able to carry out the tasks associated with parenting because of her mental or emotional illness and that her conduct was unlikely to change, as evidenced by her failure to comply with the treatment plan within 15 months. Absent clear error, the termination of the mother's parental rights was affirmed. In re M.F.B., D.A.B., M.S.B., & S.L.B., 2001 MT 136, 305 M 481, 29 P3d 480 (2001).

Appropriateness of Treatment Plan Requirement That Parents Provide Explanation of Child's Injuries: Four treatment plans were developed with the parents, the purpose of all of which was to: (1) return the child to parental custody; (2) enable the parents to provide a safe and nurturing environment for the child; (3) enable the parents to develop an awareness of the child's needs and an ability to meet those needs; (4) help the parents develop minimal parenting skills; and (5) resolve the issues that led to the child's abuse, which included a requirement that the parents provide a reasonable and consistent explanation for the child's injuries. The parents were subsequently convicted of endangering the welfare of the child, and the state petitioned for custody. Prior to the permanent custody hearing, the mother moved to strike the task that required an explanation of the child's injuries, but the state never filed a brief in response to the motion. Nevertheless, the motion was denied. Following the termination of the mother's parental rights, she challenged the appropriateness of that task on grounds that the task placed her in the untenable position of having to choose between incriminating herself and failing to complete the treatment plan, in violation of her right against self-incrimination, relying on In re

A.N., 2000 MT 35, 298 M 237, 995 P2d 427 (2000). The Supreme Court found her reliance on In re A.N. misplaced. The mother waived her self-incrimination privileges by voluntarily testifying regarding her knowledge of the child's injuries at both the permanent custody hearing and during the criminal proceeding and could not argue later that the disputed task impinged on her constitutional privilege against self-incrimination. Further, the state's duty to protect children, as set out in 41-3-101, necessitated that the parents come to terms with the reasons why the child was abused, and without demonstrable willingness from the parents to resolve the abuse issues, the District Court had no assurance that the child would not be abused again. Thus, the task was a fair requirement in the treatment plan, and the District Court did not err in concluding that the plan was appropriate or in denying the motion to strike the task from the plan. Denying the motion was within the court's discretion regardless of whether the state filed a brief in response to the motion. In re A.C., 2001 MT 126, 305 M 404, 27 P3d 960 (2001).

Parents' Failure to Provide Explanation of Child's Injuries or Change Conduct — Termination of Parental Rights Proper: As a condition of a treatment plan, the District Court required the parents to provide a reasonable and consistent explanation for their child's life-threatening injuries, which was a reasonable and appropriate task. After 2 years of trying unsuccessfully to resolve the abuse issues, the District Court concluded that the treatment plan was unsuccessful because both parents had steadfastly maintained ignorance as to how the child was injured. The court also concluded that the parents' conduct was unlikely to change and terminated parental rights. The mother appealed on grounds that the court's determinations were not supported by clear and convincing evidence. The Supreme Court affirmed. The standard of review is whether the District Court's findings are clearly erroneous. Here, substantial evidence supported the conclusion that the treatment plan was not complied with and that the condition rendering the mother unfit was unlikely to change within a reasonable time, and that finding was not clearly erroneous. In re A.C., 2001 MT 126, 305 M 404, 27 P3d 960 (2001), overruling In re B.F., 2000 MT 231, 301 M 281, 8 P3d 790 (2000), and subsequent decisions to the extent that In re B.F. suggested that the Supreme Court should review a District Court's findings in a parental termination case to determine whether the findings are supported by clear and convincing evidence.

Long-Term Incarceration as Impediment to Parenting Ability — Treatment Plan Impractical: The father was sentenced to two life terms in prison with no eligibility for parole for 60 years for killing his girlfriend and her daughter. The District Court held a hearing on the termination of the father's parental rights but allowed no evidence or testimony other than the fact of his incarceration and length of sentence. The court determined that a treatment plan was impractical in light of the father's long-term incarceration and terminated his parental rights. The father appealed on grounds that a treatment plan must be established before parental rights can be terminated unless a showing of facts clearly proves the impossibility of any workable plan. Treatment plans are intended to improve a parent's ability to meet a child's needs in order to help the parent regain custody and preserve the parent-child relationship. However, in this case, no treatment plan could be devised that would remedy the fact of the father's long-term incarceration. His imprisonment presented an insurmountable impediment to his ability to provide for his child's physical, mental, and emotional needs, so the District Court did not err in finding that a treatment plan was impractical. Because a plan was not required, the court needed only to consider whether the father's conduct or condition rendering him unfit as a parent was unlikely to change within a reasonable time. Two life terms in prison so severely limited the father's parenting abilities that continuation of the parent-child relationship was not in the child's best interests, so termination of his parental rights was proper. In Re Custody & Parental Rights of M.W. & C.S., 2001 MT 78, 305 M 80, 23 P3d 206 (2001).

Sufficient Evidence to Terminate Parental Rights Without Prior Treatment Plan: The requirement of a treatment plan may be waived under this section upon a finding that "two medical doctors or clinical psychologists submit testimony that the parent cannot assume the role of parent". Two doctors did submit evaluations to that effect in this case, and the District Court waived the treatment plan requirement. On appeal, the mother contended that the doctors' testimony was canceled by the testimony of two other doctors, called by her, who testified positively regarding the mother's ability to parent. However, the evaluation of one of the mother's doctors was conducted for the limited purpose of determining whether the mother was qualified for Social Security income, and the other doctor's testimony exclusively addressed the issue of whether the mother should be permitted to continue weekly visits with the child and did not deal with the issue of her potential to assume the role of parent. Thus, the District Court did not err when it terminated the mother's parental rights based on the testimony by two medical doctors or clinical psychologists that the mother could not assume the role of parent without the court first requiring implementation of an appropriate parenting plan. In re A.M., 2001 MT 60, 304 M 379, 22 P3d 185 (2001).

Evidence Improperly Admitted Regarding Incident With "Baby Think It Over" Doll — Parental Rights Terminated Based on Statutory Criteria: The Department received a referral regarding J.M.'s birth, indicating that the parents had intellectual disabilities. The parents were provided with a "Baby Think It Over" doll, which is an infant simulator used in parenting classes that records incidents of neglect and significant abuse if not tended to. The simulator also measures a parent's ability or willingness to respond to an infant's time demands. The simulator recorded an incident of abuse for which the parents had no explanation. As part of a subsequent proceeding to terminate parental rights, the District Court allowed the introduction of evidence regarding the incident. Parental rights were terminated based on the parents' noncompliance with their treatment plan. On appeal, the mother contended that the court erred in allowing evidence regarding the doll because a sufficient foundation was not provided for admission of the evidence. The Supreme Court agreed that the state failed to provide a sufficient foundation for admission of the evidence, such as whether the doll was functioning properly at the time that it was used and whether the results of its use were reliable. The doll's recordation of an incident of abuse did not establish a consequential fact relevant to the state's contention that the parents had not complied with their treatment plan and that the parents' condition was unlikely to change, so the evidence was inadmissible. However, the state did provide sufficient other evidence to support its contention. Thus, although evidence regarding the doll was erroneously allowed, the evidence would not have affected the outcome of the case, so the error was harmless. In re J.M., 2001 MT 51, 304 M 303, 21 P3d 618 (2001).

Finding That Father Unlikely to Change Because of Incarceration Upheld: Michael argued that his parental rights should not have been terminated because he had substantially complied with his court-ordered treatment plan by completing anger management and parenting classes, attending substance abuse treatment, and staying sober. The lower court found that because of his incarceration, Michael was unlikely to be able to change within a reasonable time the condition of being unable to provide a stable home for his son. The Supreme Court held that reasonable evidence supported the lower court's findings and therefore it had properly terminated Michael's parental rights. In re Custody & Parental Rights of C.F., H.F., & J.F., 2001 MT 19, 304 M 134, 18 P3d 1014 (2001).

Substantial Compliance Does Not Constitute Successful Completion: Michael argued that his parental rights should not have been terminated because he had substantially complied with his court-ordered treatment plan by completing anger management and parenting classes, attending substance abuse treatment, and staying sober. The Supreme Court held that substantial compliance was not enough because Michael, by returning to incarceration, was unable to provide a stable home, food, and clothing for his son and therefore the lower court had not erred in terminating his parental rights. In re Custody & Parental Rights of C.F., H.F., & J.F., 2001 MT 19, 304 M 134, 18 P3d 1014 (2001), following In re J.H., 2000 MT 11, 298 M 41, 994 P2d 37 (2000).

Inclusion of Self-Incriminating Requirement as One Element of Parenting Plan — Harmless Error: As part of his third parenting treatment plan, the father was required to affirmatively explain the cause of his child's injuries, assume responsibility for any injuries inflicted on the child, and cooperate with law enforcement to resolve the related criminal charges against him. In essence, the state used the treatment plan to make an official inquiry into the child's injuries, leaving the father with the Hobson's choice of either disclosing his involvement in the child's injuries and incriminating himself in the criminal proceeding or facing certain termination of his parental rights. The Supreme Court found the requirement to be inappropriate. However, the requirement impacted only one goal of five that the District Court found were not successfully met and only one task of four that were not completed. Thus, inclusion of the inappropriate requirement did not significantly impact the District Court's decision to terminate the father's parental rights or result in substantial injustice. The error was harmless, and the Supreme Court affirmed. In re A.N. & C.N., 2000 MT 35, 298 M 237, 995 P2d 427, 57 St. Rep. 155 (2000).

Unsuccessful Short-Term Treatment Plans — Parental Rights of Incarcerated Parent Terminated: The mother was offered two short-term treatment plans while she was incarcerated and was led to believe that if she completed these plans, she would be allowed to parent her child upon release from prison. The short timeframe for the treatment plans was due to representations made by the mother regarding when she expected to be released, but the state conducted no followup investigation to determine when she would actually be eligible for release and what the conditions of her release would be. Her incarceration was subsequently extended, and after determining that the treatment plans were not successful, the District Court terminated her parental rights. The Supreme Court affirmed, finding no error in the District Court's conclusion. In re J.H., 2000 MT 11, 298 M 41, 994 P2d 37, 57 St. Rep. 60 (2000).

Error in Finding That Parent Not in Compliance With Either Preincarceration or Incarceration Treatment Plan — Termination of Rights Affirmed Absent Evidence of Likely Change in Parental Conduct: A parenting plan was drawn for a mother, but she did not comply with it because of her subsequent incarceration. A second plan was then drawn that took into account the mother's incarceration. The District Court later concluded, incorrectly, that the mother had not complied with either plan. However, whether the parent's contrary conduct occurred before the treatment plan or after the termination of the plan, the results were essentially the same because the plan could not be considered successful under its terms. Further, the court relied on clear and convincing evidence in determining that the mother's conduct or condition that rendered her unfit was unlikely to change within a reasonable time. Having addressed each applicable statutory requirement, the court's termination of the mother's parental rights was affirmed. Failure to Complete Treatment Goals — Child in State Custody for Over Twenty Months — Substantial Evidence Supporting Termination of Parental Rights: Applying the standard of whether substantial evidence supported the District Court's findings of fact, the Supreme Court affirmed the termination of the mother's parental rights. Although the mother made positive changes in her life in the months preceding the hearing, she did not successfully complete or meet the goals of any of four court-approved treatment plans during the more than 20 months that her child was in Department custody. On this record, the District Court's finding that the conduct or condition that rendered her unfit to parent her child was unlikely to change within a reasonable time was supported by substantial evidence and was not otherwise erroneous. In re J.M.J., 1999 MT 277, 296 M 510, 989 P2d 840, 56 St. Rep. 1119 (1999).

Termination of Incarcerated Father's Parental Rights Proper — Treatment Plan Impractical: The District Court did not err when it concluded that a treatment plan was not practical for an incarcerated father who, even with parole, would be limited to only supervised visits with his children. No treatment plan would obviate the difficulty that the children would have in knowing him as their father after his extended incarceration. The incarceration and sentencing conditions presented a substantial long-term impediment to his ability to provide for the children's physical, mental, and emotional needs, limiting his parenting abilities to the extent that continuation of the parent-child relationship was not in the children's best interests. Therefore, it was not error for the District Court to terminate the father's parental rights. No Treatment Plan in Effect at Time of Mother's Unauthorized Contact With Father — Termination of Parental Rights Reversed: When the mother surreptitiously contacted the father, who had had his parental rights terminated after being convicted of murdering the couple's other child, the state petitioned to terminate the mother's parental rights as well. Parental rights may be terminated when each of the following statutory requirements has been established: (1) the child must have been adjudicated a youth in need of care; (2) an appropriate treatment plan must have been approved by the court but not been complied with by the parent or not been successful; and (3) the conduct or condition of the unfit parent is unlikely to change within a reasonable time. In this case, the Supreme Court reversed the termination order in the absence of clear and convincing evidence that the mother failed to comply with a court-approved treatment plan because there was no treatment plan in effect at the time of her unauthorized contact with the father. In re J.A.B., 1999 MT 173, 295 M 227, 983 P2d 387, 56 St. Rep. 675 (1999).

Conditions Constituting Impractical Treatment Plan — Parent's Lack of Cooperation in Providing Information Insufficient to Render Plan Impractical: The District Court found that a treatment plan for an incarcerated father was impractical considering the length of incarceration, the father's lack of cooperation with the Department in refusing to release his medical records, and the distance between Montana and Minnesota where he was incarcerated. The court terminated his parental rights. A Department social worker told the incarcerated father that there could be no evaluation or treatment plan unless he released his medical records, which he did not do. Thus, implementation of a treatment plan was not discussed. At a minimum, the impracticality provision requires that the Department discuss the possibility of implementing a treatment plan with a parent, but not only was no plan discussed, the Department did not advise the father that his cooperation was necessary for him to participate in a plan. A parent's lack of cooperation in disclosing information is an insufficient ground by itself to conclude that a treatment plan is impractical unless the parent has been clearly informed that cooperation is necessary. In re J.F. & C.F., 1999 MT 131, 294 M 494, 982 P2d 1011, 56 St. Rep. 528 (1999), following In re W.Z., 285 M 16, 946 P2d 125, 54 St. Rep. 1019 (1997).

Appropriateness of Treatment Plan for Incarcerated Person: At the hearing on the petition for temporary legal custody, the mother testified by telephone because she was in prison in Idaho at the time for battery of a minor. She stated that she had 88 days left until she was eligible for release and that she was willing to work on a treatment plan while incarcerated. The social worker who prepared the plan recognized that the mother was limited in what she could accomplish while in prison and would be unable to complete the plan until she was released but pointed out that the prison programs would fulfill some of the treatment plan requirements. Because of disciplinary problems, she was not paroled. The mother later asserted, and the Supreme Court agreed, that most of the treatment plan was designed for a person who was not incarcerated. However, the plan was drafted when the mother had a chance of being released and was directed at the problems facing her and the children. She was adequately represented by counsel and did not object to the plan as presented. The District Court did not err in finding that the treatment plan was appropriate and that termination of parental rights was proper given the mother's neglect in even attempting to comply with the plan and given the denial of her parole because of her bad behavior. In re J.N. & A.N., 1999 MT 64, 293 M 524, 977 P2d 317, 56 St. Rep. 269 (1999), distinguishing In re W.Z., 285 M 16, 946 P2d 125, 54 St. Rep. 1019 (1997), and followed in In re M.A.E., 1999 MT 341, 297 M 434, 991 P2d 972, 56 St. Rep. 1349 (1999).

Well-Intentioned Efforts Toward Success of Treatment Plan — Insufficient Minimum Compliance Justifying Termination of Parental Rights: A mother's attempts to comply with the terms of four approved treatment plans, though well-intentioned, were insufficient to meet minimum compliance with the plan and did not constitute successful treatment. A treatment plan can be unsuccessful even when the tasks dictated by the plan are completed. The District Court held correctly that continuing the parent-child relationship would likely result in continued abuse or neglect of the children because of the mother's repeated inability to protect the children from abuse by others and that her conduct, having failed to change significantly in the past, was unlikely to change within a reasonable time in the future. Record Showing Child to Be Youth in Need of Care and Failure of Mother to Complete Treatment Plan Held Sufficient for Termination of Parental Rights: The parental rights of M.M., the natural mother of A.W-M., were terminated by the District Court based on its finding that A.W-M. was a youth in need of care and that M.M. failed to complete her treatment plan. The Supreme Court reviewed the District Court record and found that the record contained substantial credible evidence that A.W-M. was a youth in need of care, including evidence that A.W-M. was left with a babysitter when she was 7 months old and sick with bronchitis, that after treatment, doctors would not release A.W-M. to her mother's care because her mother "appeared to be high", that M.M. made little effort to comply with her treatment plan, and that A.W-M. had been left with other caregivers for indefinite periods of time. The Supreme Court also found substantial evidence that M.M. could not be expected to complete her treatment plan in the foreseeable future, including evidence that she tested positive for use of a controlled substance, was unable to obtain stable employment or housing, failed to attend court-ordered counseling, visited only sporadically with A.W-M., and agreed in her testimony that she should not be given further time to comply with her treatment plan. Treatment Plan Never Offered to Incarcerated Parent — Termination of Parental Rights Improper Absent Plan: Father had been incarcerated for more than 1 year, so pursuant to subsection (4)(b) of this section, the District Court terminated the father's parental rights on the grounds that: (1) a treatment plan was impractical in light of his incarceration; (2) the date of his release from prison was unknown; and (3) he had shown minimal interest in his child. The Supreme Court disagreed, noting that neither the Department nor the social worker involved in the case ever presented or examined the possibility of a treatment plan with the father; therefore, the practicality of a treatment plan could not be determined when a treatment plan had never been offered or discussed. Failure to demonstrate the impracticality of an unoffered treatment plan constituted reversible error. In re W.Z., 285 M 16, 946 P2d 125, 54 St. Rep. 1019

Complete History Relevant to Termination of Incarcerated Parent's Parental Rights: This section recognizes that a child may need help while a parent is incarcerated and that such help cannot be delayed pending the parent's release. Thus, a treatment plan is not required if the parent's incarceration for more than 1 year makes a treatment plan impractical. Further, a complete history of a parent's neglect and abuse of the children and of all attempts to comply with prior treatment plans is relevant to whether parental rights should be terminated, rather than a parent's performance only under the latest treatment plan. The primary consideration is the physical, mental, and emotional conditions and needs of the children. In re K.F.L. & N.L., 275 M 102, 910 P2d 241, 53 St. Rep. 57 (1996).

Absence of Court-Approved Treatment Plan Not Bar to Termination of Parental Rights — Warning to Follow Law in Future Cases: In proceedings to terminate a mother's parental rights, the Department prepared and executed a treatment plan, but the mother refused to sign it. The plan was filed with the court, but the judge failed to officially sign it. The court found that the mother had allowed her children to be sexually abused or exploited and terminated her parental rights. The mother appealed on the grounds that this section requires a court-approved treatment plan before parental rights may be terminated. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed the termination despite the requirements of this section and warned the Department to follow the law in future cases or risk reversal of terminations. This section does not require that the parent sign the treatment plan in order for the court to approve it. In re Inquiry Into M.M., 274 M 166, 906 P2d 675, 52 St. Rep. 1170 (1995).

Failure to Complete Alcohol Treatment Programs Grounds for Termination of Parental Rights: T.M., whose mother died when he was 14 months old, was diagnosed as having fetal alcohol syndrome and required constant parental supervision. His father was repeatedly incarcerated for alcohol-related offenses and unable to take care of T.M. during those times. T.M.'s father also repeatedly failed to complete treatment programs for alcohol abuse, domestic violence, and anger management. The Supreme Court held that in applying its standard of review, the lower court's decision to terminate T.M.'s father's parental rights was not clearly erroneous given the fact that the record showed that the father had failed to complete required treatment and that it was in the best interests of the child that the father's parental rights be terminated. In re Custody of T.M., 267 M 75, 881 P2d 1333, 51 St. Rep. 952 (1994).

Failure to Complete Treatment Plan — Out-of-Home Placement for Over Two Years — Termination of Parental Rights Upheld: The District Court did not err in terminating a father's parental rights when the father failed to complete treatment recommended by psychological evaluations, failed to enter into counseling to develop effective methods of discipline and to understand the children's needs as victims of sexual abuse, and continued to deny various aspects of the mother's sexual abuse of the children. Overwhelming evidence that the father failed to comply with critical parts of the treatment plan met the statutory requirements for termination of parental rights. Appropriateness of Treatment Plan Requiring Psychological Therapy for Indigent Mother: Mother contended that the court-ordered treatment plan implemented in her case was inappropriate because the court failed to consider her financial situation when it ordered her to undergo treatment that included continuing psychotherapy, for which she was required to pay, and that her indigency thus doomed the plan to failure. Noting that the treatment plan was agreed to by the mother on advice of counsel, the Supreme Court found substantial testimony regarding failure of the treatment plan, beyond her indigency, that indicated circumstances that rendered the plan unsuccessful but not necessarily inappropriate. Successful Treatment Plan, Not Just Compliance With Plan, Required: Parents contended their parental rights were wrongfully terminated because there was no evidence that the treatment plan failed or that their lack of fitness was unlikely to change. However, the treatment plan required not only compliance with but a successful completion of the plan, which was not accomplished. Coupled with the fact of ongoing and continuous unfitness unlikely to change within a reasonable time, termination of parental rights was proper. Operation of Treatment Plan Interrupted by Parent's Incarceration — Termination of Parental Rights Affirmed: The District Court did not err in terminating a mother's parental rights rather than awarding long-term custody to the Department of Family Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) when: (1) a 6-month treatment plan had not even begun when the mother was incarcerated 4 months after approval of the plan; (2) although her incarceration may have interfered with her ability to complete the plan, her failure to timely begin the plan, coupled with her failure to complete previously assigned parenting tasks, foretold the potential failure of the plan; and (3) the mother's conduct was unlikely to change within a reasonable time. Partial Compliance With Treatment Plan — Possibility of Change of Conduct — Parental Rights Terminated: The District Court did not abuse its discretion in terminating parental custody and transferring legal custody to the state when evidence showed that the mother only partially complied with a treatment plan and that the possibility that she might be able to change her conduct in 8 to 12 months was outweighed by the immediacy of the children's needs for stability and predictability. Failure of Parent to Complete Court-Approved Treatment Plan — Burden of Proof Met in Termination of Parental Rights: The state met the burden of proof in terminating parental rights after showing, by clear and convincing evidence, that the father of the youths in need of care did not comply with several tasks required under a court-approved treatment plan, including: (1) meeting with therapists on a scheduled basis; (2) completing a series of parenting classes; (3) establishing contact with and visiting the children; and (4) providing a home large enough to accommodate all the children. Further, the state was responsible to assist the father in establishing treatment but was not required to force him to comply with the treatment plan. Exceptions to Treatment Plan Requirement: A mother's parental rights may be extinguished without a finding that she has not complied with a court-approved treatment plan or that such plan has been unsuccessful. Exceptions in the statute allow for extinguishment of parental rights of a mentally ill person without establishing a court-approved treatment plan as long as two medical doctors testify that the parent is so severely mentally ill that she cannot assume the role of parent. In this case, three psychiatrists testified that the mother suffered from chronic schizophrenia and agreed that her history of mental illness showed little hope that she could assume her parental role. In re Baby Boy Scott, 235 M 253, 767 P2d 298, 45 St. Rep. 2362 (1988).

Failure of Rehabilitative Training as Criteria for Termination: The District Court did not abuse its discretion in terminating parental rights upon finding that despite several years of rehabilitative training to improve the mother's parenting and home management skills, she was unfit, unable, and unwilling to care for her children and failed to provide a stable home environment. In re M.J.D., C.K.D., & A.R.D., 225 M 200, 731 P2d 937, 44 St. Rep. 167 (1987), followed in In re B.T.B. & B.B., 254 M 449, 840 P2d 558, 49 St. Rep. 594 (1992), and In re J.M.W.E.H., 1998 MT 18, 287 M 239, 954 P2d 26, 55 St. Rep. 65 (1998).

Substantial Credible Evidence to Terminate Parental Rights: Evidence was held sufficient to support trial court's findings that appellant failed to comply with court-approved treatment plan and that appellant's condition which rendered her unfit to be a parent is unlikely to change within a reasonable time. Substantial credible evidence supports the findings, and they may not be set aside unless clearly erroneous. In re R.M.B., Youth in Need of Care, 213 M 29, 689 P2d 281, 41 St. Rep. 1925 (1984).

STANDARD OF REVIEW

Standard of Review — Custody Determinations and Termination of Parental Rights:

The Supreme Court reviews a District Court decision to terminate parental rights to determine whether there was an abuse of discretion. The District Court's conclusions of law are reviewed to determine whether the law was interpreted correctly. The test for abuse of discretion is whether the trial court acted arbitrarily, without employment of conscientious judgment, or exceeded the bounds of reason resulting in substantial injustice. A parent's fundamental liberty interest in the right to the care and custody of a child must be protected by fundamentally fair procedures. To satisfy the statutory requirements for terminating parental rights, a District Court must make specific factual findings, and those finding are reviewed to determine whether they are clearly erroneous. Although a decision to terminate parental rights is not to be taken lightly, the District Court decision is presumed to be correct and will not be disturbed on appeal unless there is a mistake of law or a finding of fact not supported by substantial evidence that would amount to a clear abuse of discretion. In re D.V., 2003 MT 160, 316 M 282, 70 P3d 1253 (2003), following In re J.V., S.V., T.V., & M.V., 2003 MT 68, 314 M 487, 67 P3d 242 (2003), and In re K.C.H., 2003 MT 125, 316 M 13, 68 P3d 788 (2003), and followed in In re V.F.A., 2005 MT 76, 326 M 383, 109 P3d 749 (2005). See also In re S.R., R.R., & G.R. Jr., 2004 MT 227, 322 M 424, 97 P3d 559 (2004), and In re A.A. & D.A., 2005 MT 119, 327 M 127, 112 P3d 993 (2005).

The Supreme Court has adopted a different standard of review for nonjury findings of fact than is applied to jury verdicts. The standard set out in Interstate Prod. Credit Ass'n v. DeSaye, 250 M 320, 820 P2d 1285 (1991), is the appropriate standard to be applied to purely factual findings in a proceeding to terminate parental rights. The rule set out in In re Marriage of Burris, 258 M 265, 852 P2d 616 (1993), that the court generally will review conclusions of law to determine whether they are correct, is the appropriate basis for reviewing most conclusions of law in a termination proceeding. However, the conclusion that a child is abused or neglected involves a decision that is neither purely factual nor purely legal and is thus analogous to a District Court's determination of conscionability when reviewing marital and property settlement agreements. Thus, in challenges to a District Court's determination regarding abuse or neglect, review involves a determination as to whether there was an abuse of discretion. In re D.H. & F.H., 264 M 521, 872 P2d 803, 51 St. Rep. 386 (1994).

The same standard of review applies to both termination of parental rights and custody determinations. As set out in In re R.A.D., 231 M 143, 753 P2d 862, 45 St. Rep. 496 (1988), in both instances the District Court's decision is afforded all reasonable presumptions as to the correctness of the determination, and therefore the decision will not be disturbed on appeal unless there is a mistake of law or a finding of fact not supported by substantial evidence that would amount to a clear abuse of discretion. In re S.P., 241 M 190, 786 P2d 642, 47 St. Rep. 190 (1990), distinguished in In re D.H. & F.H., supra, and followed in In re J.J.C.H. & C.M.H., 252 M 158, 827 P2d 812, 49 St. Rep. 193 (1992), In re J.R. & S.D., 253 M 434, 833 P2d 1063, 49 St. Rep. 513 (1992), and in In re Custody & Parental Rights of M.D. 262 M 183, 864 P2d 783, 50 St. Rep. 1505 (1993).

Review of District Court Findings Regarding Termination of Parental Rights: In reviewing a District Court's findings regarding termination of parental rights, the Supreme Court will not consider whether the evidence will support a different finding or substitute its judgment for that of the factfinder regarding the weight given to the evidence. Further, determining whether conduct or a condition rendering a parent unfit is likely to change within a reasonable time requires an assessment of the parent's past and present conduct. In re L.S., 2003 MT 12, 314 M 42, 63 P3d 497 (2003), followed in In re D.G. & R.G., 2005 MT 139, 327 M 266, 114 P3d 201 (2005). See also In re T.A.G., 2002 MT 4, 308 M 89, 39 P3d 686 (2002), and In re M.T., 2002 MT 174, 310 M 506, 51 P3d 1141 (2002).

Definition of Clear and Convincing Evidence: In the context of parental rights termination cases, clear and convincing evidence is defined as simply a requirement that a preponderance of the evidence be definite, clear, and convincing or that a particular issue be clearly established by a preponderance of the evidence or by a clear preponderance of the proof. The requirement does not call for unanswerable or conclusive evidence. In re E.A.T. & T.A.T., 1999 MT 281, 296 M 535, 989 P2d 860, 56 St. Rep. 1133 (1999). See also In re E.W., C.W., & A.W., 1998 MT 135, 289 M 190, 959 P2d 951 (1998), and In re M.T., T.T., D.T., & B.W., 2002 MT 174, 310 M 506, 51 P3d 1141 (2002).

Test to Determine if Findings Clearly Erroneous: The Supreme Court adopted the following test to determine whether findings used in terminating parental rights are clearly erroneous: (1) the record will be reviewed to see if the findings are supported by substantial evidence; (2) if the findings are supported by substantial evidence, the Supreme Court will determine whether the trial court misapprehended the effect of the evidence; and (3) if substantial evidence exists and the effect of the evidence has not been misapprehended, the Supreme Court may still find clear error when, although there is evidence to support it, a review of the record leaves the court with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. Applying the test in the present case, the finding that a continued relationship between parents and children would result in continued abuse of the children was consistent with the evidence and was not clearly erroneous. Failure to Complete Alcohol Treatment Programs Grounds for Termination of Parental Rights: T.M., whose mother died when he was 14 months old, was diagnosed as having fetal alcohol syndrome and required constant parental supervision. His father was repeatedly incarcerated for alcohol-related offenses and unable to take care of T.M. during those times. T.M.'s father also repeatedly failed to complete treatment programs for alcohol abuse, domestic violence, and anger management. The Supreme Court held that in applying its standard of review, the lower court's decision to terminate T.M.'s father's parental rights was not clearly erroneous given the fact that the record showed that the father had failed to complete required treatment and that it was in the best interests of the child that the father's parental rights be terminated. Case Notes

No Standing by Former Parent to Object to Child's Placement or Assert Child's Rights: Once the parent-child relationship is terminated by the District Court, a former parent has no standing to object to the court's subsequent placement of the child with the Department or by adoption. Similarly, a former parent has no standing to assert a violation of the child's rights as guardian ad litem because the former parent no longer represents the child. In re E.A.T. & T.A.T., 1999 MT 281, 296 M 535, 989 P2d 860, 56 St. Rep. 1133 (1999).

Sua Sponte Modification of Postadoption Visitation Agreement Within Discretion of District Court: The rule that in the context of separation agreements made between spouses, parties cannot make binding agreements concerning the support, custody, or visitation of children applies equally to postadoption agreements made between an adopted child's birth parents and adoptive parents. The best interests of the child are paramount, and sua sponte modification of an original visitation agreement in this case was within the discretion of the District Court after determining the best interests of the adopted child. Groves v. Clark, 1999 MT 117, 294 M 417, 982 P2d 446, 56 St. Rep. 490 (1999). See also In re Marriage of Mager, 241 M 78, 785 P2d 198, 47 St. Rep. 97 (1990), and In re Marriage of Widhalm/Miller, 279 M 97, 926 P2d 748, 53 St. Rep. 1067 (1996).

Postadoption Visitation Agreement Between Natural Mother and Adoptive Parents — Responsibilities of District Court: Groves consented to the adoption of her child by the Clarks on the condition that the Clarks sign a visitation agreement allowing Groves to have specified contact with her daughter. After the document was signed and the adoption completed, the Clarks tried to terminate Groves' contact with her daughter. Groves brought an action for specific performance of the visitation agreement, but the District Court held that the agreement was void from its inception under 40-8-125 (now repealed). The Supreme Court reversed, holding that In re C.P., 221 M 180, 717 P2d 1093 (1986), was distinguishable and that the Legislature would not have enacted 40-8-136 (now repealed) if 40-8-125 (now repealed) terminated the interests of the natural parent altogether. The Supreme Court also noted that 40-8-136 (now repealed) also places a burden upon the adoptive parents and, in this case, upon the adoption agency that acted as Groves' agent, to make sure that the visitation agreement was filed in accordance with that statute. The Supreme Court also concluded that under 40-8-114 (now repealed), the District Court has a responsibility to make sure that the enforcement is in the best interests of the child. Groves v. Clark, 277 M 179, 920 P2d 981, 53 St. Rep. 703 (1996). The District Court did not err when it later modified sua sponte the parties' postadoption visitation agreement to provide weekend visitation and weekly telephone contact with the birth mother because the modification was determined to be in the best interests of the child. The finding was supported by substantial evidence, and the court did not misapprehend the effect of the evidence. Adoptive parents do not have sole discretion in deciding whether a postadoption visitation agreement should be enforced. Rather, the adoptive parents' wishes are but one factor among many to be considered in determining the child's best interests under 40-4-212. Groves v. Clark, 1999 MT 117, 294 M 417, 982 P2d 446, 56 St. Rep. 490 (1999).

Refusal to Grant Contact — Child's Best Interest: A natural mother may be allowed to maintain contact with her child after her parental rights have been extinguished only upon a showing that contact is in the child's best interest. In this case, the mother failed to present any testimony regarding the effect such contact would have upon the child. In addition, the record clearly shows that it would not be in the child's best interest to allow the mother to maintain contact with him. In re Baby Boy Scott, 235 M 253, 767 P2d 298, 45 St. Rep. 2362 (1988).

Termination of Parental Rights While Maintaining Possibility of Parental Contact — Adoption Exception: There is no apparent conflict in terminating parental rights while simultaneously maintaining the possibility of parental contact. It was within the trial judge's discretion to terminate the mother's parental rights, due to her recurring mental problems, while allowing contact with the children if the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) determined it was in the children's best interests, since the children had a psychological attachment to their mother. However, when parental rights are terminated, continuing contact is allowable only in exceptional cases. In the event of adoption, continuing contact cannot be court-ordered even with Department approval. In re Declaring V.B., T.B., D.B., & B.B. Youths in Need of Care, 229 M 133, 744 P2d 1248, 44 St. Rep. 1838 (1987), followed in In re D.G., 244 M 17, 795 P2d 489, 47 St. Rep. 1408 (1990).

Parents to Have No Visitation Rights After Termination of Parental Rights Proceeding: Neither 40-8-125 (now repealed) nor 41-3-611 provides for a retention of visitation rights by the natural parent in the event of termination of parental rights and later adoption. In re C.P., 221 M 180, 717 P2d 1093, 43 St. Rep. 728 (1986).

(a) state laws, policies, and practices affecting permanence and appropriate care for children in the custody of the department of public health and human services and other agencies; and

(b) the effectiveness of the local citizen review board in bringing about permanence and appropriate care for children in the custody of the department of public health and human services and other agencies.

(3) The Montana supreme court shall adopt procedures that have the force of law for the administration of the local citizen review board pilot program regarding:

(a) the removal of members of the local citizen review board;

(b) the time, content, and manner in which case plans for and case progress reports on a child assigned to foster care must be provided to the local citizen review board by the department of public health and human services, other agencies, or individuals directly responsible for the care of the child;

(c) the provision of written notice of the review to the department of public health and human services, any other agency directly responsible for the care or placement of a child, the parents or their attorneys, foster parents, surrogate parents, mature children or their attorneys, a court-appointed attorney or special advocate of any child, any county attorney or attorney general actively involved in the case, and other interested persons. The notice must include a statement that persons receiving a notice may participate in the hearing and be accompanied by a representative.

(d) securing or excusing the presence at the review of caseworkers and other employees of the department of public health and human services or other agencies directly responsible for the care of the child; and

(e) the manner in which the local citizen review board may remove cases from review when review is not required under federal law"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 2001.

Rules for Local Citizen Review Boards: On February 8, 1996, the Montana Supreme Court adopted the following operating rules for local citizen review boards (See 2001 amendment, which substituted reference to a board for reference to a local citizen review board. "Board" is defined in 41-3-1003 as a citizen review board.):

Rule 1. Appointments and Vacancies

Each local citizen review board shall be composed of at least three and not more than five members appointed by the district court judge or judges. See 41-3-1003(2), MCA.

Members of a local citizen review board must be recruited from groups with special knowledge of or interest in foster care and child welfare, which may include but is not limited to adoptive parents and members of the professions of law, medicine, psychology, social work, and education. As far as practicable, members of a local citizen review board shall represent the various socioeconomic and ethnic groups of the area served. See 41-3-1003(3), MCA.

No person employed by the department of public health and human services (hereinafter referred to as the "department"), by any private agency regulated, certified, directed or licensed by or contracting with the department, or by a district court shall serve on any local citizen review board. See 41-3-1003(3), MCA.

If a vacancy occurs on a local citizen review board, a successor shall be appointed to serve the unexpired term. Members may be reappointed and shall continue to serve until a successor is appointed. See 41-3-1006, MCA. The court shall appoint a successor within thirty days from date of notification of the vacancy.

Rule 2. Officers and Employees

Each local citizen review board shall elect annually from its membership a presiding officer and vice presiding officer to serve in the absence of the presiding officer. See 41-3-1006(2), MCA. The officers of the board may be reelected. The Supreme Court Administrators office shall employ citizen review board staff who will provide support services to each local citizen review board.

Rule 3. Oath of Office

Before beginning to serve on a local citizen review board, each member shall swear or affirm to the court that the member will keep confidential the information reviewed by the board and the boards actions and recommendations in individual cases. See 41-3-1007, MCA.

Rule 4. Quorum and Substitutions

A review will generally be conducted with no less than three review board members. The sole exception will be that two members may conduct a review if they both agree to do so and if the citizen review board staff person for the review also agrees. If a member will be unable to attend a scheduled board review, he or she must notify the citizen review board staff as soon as possible. The citizen review board staff shall then obtain the attendance, if possible, of an alternate board member if one exists or the attendance of a member of a different local citizen review board appointed by the same court.

Rule 5. Duties

Board members shall attend all regularly scheduled board reviews and attend and participate in the training provided to the local citizen review boards by the citizen review board staff. The local citizen review board shall keep accurate records and retain those records on file. See 41-3-1010(7), MCA.

Rule 6. Meeting Place and Time

Each local citizen review board shall meet at the nearest department office or another place mutually agreed to by a majority of the board, as often as it considers necessary to carry out the duties of the board. See 41-3-1006(2)(b), MCA. The local citizen review board shall consult with the citizen review board staff in making these decisions.

Rule 7. Decisions of Board

Actions of a local citizen review board shall be decided by consensus or, when consensus is not possible, then by a majority vote.

Rule 8. Conflict of Interest

Whenever a member of a local citizen review board has a potential conflict of interest in a case being reviewed, the member shall declare to the local citizen review board the nature of the potential conflict prior to participating in the case review. The declaration of the member shall be recorded in the official records of the board. If, in the judgment of the majority of the local board, the potential conflict of interest may prevent the member from fairly and objectively reviewing the case, the local board may remove the member from participation in the review. See 41-3-1010(6), MCA.

Rule 9. Removal of Board Members

The court may remove a board member for: (1) non-participation in reviews or training; (2) establishing residence in a judicial district other than the one in which the person was appointed to serve on the review board; (3) violating the duty of keeping confidential the information received by the board and its actions and recommendations in individual cases; or (4) for other good cause as necessary for the administration of the program. See 41-3-1005, MCA.

Rule 10. Notice of Reviews

Citizen review board staff shall send written notice at least twelve days prior to a review of a given case to the department, any other agency directly responsible for the care or placement of the child, the parents or their attorneys, foster parents, surrogate parents, mature children or their attorneys, the court-appointed attorney, guardian ad litem or special advocate of any child, any county attorney or attorney general actively involved in the case, and other interested persons. Notice of the review may also be sent to younger children, if appropriate. Such notice shall briefly describe the review process, shall indicate the precise time and place of the review, and shall invite the recipients to participate in the review. The notice shall further inform these persons of their right to be accompanied by a representative. See 41-3-1004(3), MCA.

Rule 11. Case Review Information

Each local citizen review board shall have access to any records of the district court which are pertinent to the case and any records of the department or other agencies which would be admissible in a dispositional review hearing conducted pursuant to 41-3-406, MCA, including school records and reports of private service providers contained in the records of the department or other agencies. See 41-3-1008(1), MCA.

All requested records not already before the local citizen review board must be submitted by the department within seven working days after receipt of a request. A local citizen review board and the citizen review board staff shall return all records and copies received from the department to the department within seven working days after completion of the review. See 41-3-1008(2), MCA.

A local citizen review board may retain a reference copy of case material used by the board if the material is necessary for the ongoing work of the board with regard to the particular case or to other work of the board and if the confidentiality of the material is continued and protected in the same manner as other materials received from the department. Material retained by the local citizen review board is not subject to disclosure under the public records law. See 41-3-1008(3), MCA.

If a local citizen review board is denied access to requested records, it may request a hearing. The court may require the organization in possession of the records to show cause why the records should not be made available. See 41-3-1008(4), MCA.

Rule 12. Review Hearings

A local citizen review board may agree to hear any person who formally requests to be heard at a childs case review, as long as the person has some connection with or knowledge of the child or family situation. Persons receiving a notice of the hearing may be accompanied to the review by a representative of their choosing, who shall be allowed to present information to the board. See 41-3-1004(3)(c), MCA.

Other persons directly concerned with the citizen review board system or with a legitimate interest in the system may be permitted to attend a review if all interested persons present agree. The Supreme Court Administrator or citizen review board staff may attend all meetings of a citizen review board.

Before participating in a local citizen review board case review, each participant shall swear or affirm to the board that the participant will keep confidential the information disclosed by the board in the case review and to disclose it only as authorized by law. See 41-3-1010(9), MCA.

The review board acting through the presiding officer may excuse any person from any hearing on its own initiative or at the request of any participant.

In the event that a child is present to give information, the presiding officer may ask that a board member or board coordinator meet privately with the child if it is determined that this would facilitate the childs ability to communicate.

A district court judge may choose to relieve a board from reviewing a case if a complete judicial review of the case has taken place within sixty days prior to the next scheduled board review. See 41-3-1010(3), MCA.

Rule 13. Agency Attendance at Reviews

Unless excused from doing so by the local citizen review board, the department and any other agency directly responsible for the care and placement of the child shall require the presence of any employees having knowledge of the case at local board meetings. The local citizen review board may require the presence of specific employees of the department or agency at local board meetings. See 41-3-1012, MCA.

Rule 14. Review Board Findings and Recommendations

After reviewing each case, the local citizen review board shall prepare written findings and recommendations with respect to:

(1) whether reasonable efforts were made prior to the placement to prevent or to eliminate the need for removal of the child from the home and to make it possible for the child to be returned home; (2) the continuing need for and appropriateness of the placement; (3) compliance with the case plan; (4) the progress that has been made toward alleviating the need for placement; (5) a likely date by which the child may be returned home or placed for adoption; (6) other problems, solutions, or alternatives that the board determines should be explored; and (7) whether the district court should appoint an attorney, guardian ad litem or other person as special advocate to represent or appear on behalf of the child. See 41-3-1010(5), MCA.

The citizen review board staff will prepare the findings and recommendations for distribution. The citizen review board staff shall send copies of the local citizen review boards written findings and recommendations to the district court, the department, and other participants in the review. See 41-3-1010(7), MCA. The findings and recommendations shall be mailed within twenty-one days of the review.

The court shall review the findings and recommendations of the local citizen review board within ten days after receiving them. See 41-3-1013(1), MCA.

The department shall review the findings and recommendations of the local citizen review board within ten days after receiving them. The recommendations must be implemented and the case plan modified as the department considers appropriate and as resources permit. The department must give the local citizen review board written notice no later than seventeen days after receipt of the findings and recommendations, if the department does not intend to implement the recommendations. The findings and recommendations of the local citizen review board must be included as part of the case file of the department. See 41-3-1013(2), MCA.

Rule 15. Additional Procedures and Practices

The citizen review board staff may adopt such other administrative practices and procedures not inconsistent with these rules as may be necessary for the administration of the citizen review board system.

Rule 16. Local Rules Allowed

Nothing in these rules shall be construed as limiting the power of the district courts to promulgate rules that do not conflict with these rules.

1995 Amendments: Chapter 386 in (1), near beginning, substituted "the court administrator" for "the youth court of a judicial district designated pursuant to 41-3-1002"; in (1)(a), after "establish", deleted "and approve" and after "procedures" substituted "for adoption by the Montana supreme court pursuant to subsection (3)" for "that have the force of law"; at beginning of (1)(b) deleted "approve and"; and at beginning of (3) substituted "The Montana supreme court" for "The youth court of a judicial district designated pursuant to 41-3-1002". 2001 Amendment: Chapter 570 throughout section substituted reference to citizen review board for reference to local citizen review board; in (1)(a) at beginning deleted "Except for cases removed from review under procedures established under 41-3-1004" and after "foster care" substituted "focusing on issues that are germane to the goals of permanency and to accessing appropriate services for parents and children. In evaluating the accessibility, availability, and appropriateness of services, the board may consider:

(i) the safety of the child;

(ii) whether an involved agency has selected services specifically relevant to the problems and needs of the child and family;

(iii) whether caseworkers have diligently provided services;

(iv) whether appropriate services have been available to the child and family on a timely basis; and

(v) the results of intervention.

(b) The board may review the case of a child who remains in or returns to the child's home and for whom the department retains legal custody" for "that is assigned by the district court"; in (2) substituted "The time limit must comply with the Adoption and Safe Families Act of 1997" for "The first review may not be more than 6 months after the child is placed in foster care. Subsequent reviews must take place at least once every 6 months until the child is no longer within the jurisdiction of the district court or no longer in foster care"; in (4) substituted language regarding notice of review for "The local citizen review board shall review any case in which a petition to terminate parental rights has been denied as soon as practical but no later than 45 days after the denial"; in (5)(b) after "need for" inserted "the placement" and after "appropriateness" inserted "and safety"; in (7) near middle after "department" deleted "of public health and human services" and at end inserted "unless prohibited by the confidentiality provisions of 41-3-205"; in (9) near middle of first sentence after "foster parents" substituted "children who are 12 years of age or older" for "mature children"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 2001.

1995 Amendments: Chapter 386 throughout section substituted "district court" for "youth court"; and inserted (10) concerning the immunity from suit of a person serving in a voluntary capacity on a local citizen review board. Amendment effective July 1, 1995.

Chapter 546 in (7) substituted "department of public health and human services" for "department of family services". Amendment effective July 1, 1995.

Administrative Rules

ARM 37.50.901 Interstate Compact on the Placement of Children.

Case Notes

Youth Committed to Program in Nonadjacent State — School District Not Liable for Related Education Costs: The Youth Court committed a youth to a program for sexual offenders located in Minnesota. Cost was $148 a day, of which $48 were education costs, and the court assigned payment of that portion to the youth's school district. On appeal of the assignment, the Supreme Court found that 20-5-314 authorized reciprocal tuition agreements only with states adjoining Montana but found no statutory method to calculate tuition to be paid to a school in a state not adjacent to Montana. Absent specific statutory authority, the Supreme Court held that the Youth Court erred in finding the school district liable for the youth's education costs. In re W.J.H., 226 M 479, 736 P2d 484, 44 St. Rep. 817 (1987).

Definition of "Sending Agency" — Applicability: Mother argued that she should be considered the "sending agency" under Article II of this section and that she therefore had jurisdiction to effect the return of her child whom she had formally released for adoption. The Supreme Court refused to interpret the definition so broadly, holding that such an interpretation would mean that no state or private licensed adoption agency would ever be able to act with assurance that its conduct was final. In re Male Child Born July 15, 1985, to L.C., 221 M 309, 718 P2d 660, 43 St. Rep. 835 (1986).

Jurisdiction After Child Placed for Adoption Out of State: Once a parent voluntarily signed and executed a form relinquishing parental rights to an adoption agency, the adoption agency became the "sending agency" as defined in 41-4-101, Art. II, with the power to place the child for adoption out of state. The only standing the parent then had in Montana courts was to seek a revocation of the relinquishment with the adoption agency as copetitioner. Under 40-6-135(7) (now repealed), the relinquishment became irrevocable once the child was placed for adoption out of state, and Montana lost jurisdiction. In re Male Child Born July 15, 1985, to L.C., 221 M 309, 718 P2d 660, 43 St. Rep. 835 (1986).

Violation of Interstate Compact on Placement of Children — Illegal Placement as a Result — Revocation of Parents' Consent: Failure of prospective adoptive parents to notify the appropriate public authorities in writing before bringing their prospective adoptive child into Montana violated the Interstate Compact on Placement of Children. The prospective adoptive parents' status as custodians did not prevent the operation of the Compact. By virtue of the failure of the prospective adoptive parents to comply with the Compact, the placement of the child with the prospective adoptive parents in Montana constituted illegal placement under the provision of the Compact, and the failure to comply constitutes full and sufficient grounds for the revocation of the previously executed parents' consent. In re the Adoption of T.M.M., 186 M 460, 608 P2d 130 (1980).

Attorney General's Opinions

Responsibility for Tuition of Child in Legal Custody of Local Welfare Department: If a local welfare department has legal custody by a temporary or permanent order for placement of a minor child and places that child with foster parents outside the school district of residence (residence of the natural parents in most cases), tuition would have to be paid by the district of residence. If the placement of the child is outside the state, financial responsibility for school costs would rest with the sending agency under the Interstate Compact on the Placement of Children. 40 A.G. Op. 69 (1984).

1997 Amendments: Chapter 42 near end of second sentence substituted "Title 40, chapter 5, part 1 (Uniform Interstate Family Support Act)" for "Title 40, chapter 5 (Revised Uniform Reciprocal Enforcement of Support Act)"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective March 12, 1997.

Chapter 516 in second sentence, near end after "chapter 5", substituted "part 1 (Uniform Interstate Family Support Act), 41-3-411" for "(Revised Uniform Reciprocal Enforcement of Support Act), 41-3-406"; and made minor changes in style.

1991 Amendment: Near end substituted reference to 41-3-406 for reference to 41-3-404 and 41-3-1123. Amendment effective July 1, 1991.

1983 Amendment: Changed "41-3-104" to "41-3-1122" and "41-3-405" to "41-3-1123".

Case Notes

Valid Memorandum of Agreement Allowing State to Investigate Child Abuse Allegations on Reservation and Pursue Substantiation Proceedings Against Tribal Member: The Assiniboine and Sioux Tribes of the Fort Peck Reservation entered a memorandum of agreement with the Bureau of Indian Affairs and the Montana Department of Public Health and Human Services (DPHHS), allowing DPHHS to place Indian children with enrolled tribal members living on the reservation. DPHHS subsequently placed a Minnesota Indian child with the child's great-aunt Hanna on the Fort Peck Reservation, but the placement was terminated after DPHHS received reports that the child was being abused or neglected. DPHHS subsequently initiated an investigation into the cause of the abuse and issued a substantiated report that Hanna had abused or neglected the child. Hanna moved for a fair hearing, and because no criminal charges had been filed, DPHHS began the fair hearing process. Hanna then moved to dismiss the substantiation proceeding on jurisdictional grounds. The hearings officer held that the tribe maintained exclusive jurisdiction over Indian youth and that DPHHS's substantiation proceedings interfered with tribal sovereignty. DPHHS appealed the decision in District Court, arguing that pursuant to the memorandum of agreement, DPHHS had jurisdiction to issue the substantiated report under state law and policy because DPHHS had licensed Hanna as a kinship foster care provider in the first place. The District Court agreed and reversed the hearings officer's decision. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. The purpose of the agreement was to allow eligible Indian children on the Fort Peck Reservation to receive services and foster care maintenance payments, and the agreement was a valid, federally authorized agreement. Under the agreement, DPHHS was assigned the responsibility of investigating allegations of abuse and neglect, documenting conclusions of the investigation in a final report, and making the final decision about an individual's licensing status, and the agreement did not contemplate tribal jurisdiction regarding these issues. Therefore, DPHHS had jurisdiction to pursue substantiation proceedings against Hanna. In re Fair Hearing of Hanna, 2010 MT 38, 355 Mont. 236, 227 P.3d 596.

Chapter Case Notes

Youth Tried, Convicted, and Sentenced Under Transfer Statute Correctly Sentenced as Persistent Felony Offender: In 1999, when Mainwaring was a juvenile, he pleaded guilty to mitigated deliberate homicide and was convicted pursuant to 41-5-206 and sentenced pursuant to 41-5-2503(1)(a). A part of that sentence was later suspended under 41-5-2510. Later, shortly after turning 21, Mainwaring assaulted a child. The state brought assault charges against Mainwaring and then sought to have the court designate Mainwaring as a persistent felony offender (PFO). The District Court approved the designation as a PFO, based on Mainwaring's 1999 felony conviction, and Mainwaring was convicted and sentenced to 20 years in prison. The Supreme Court held that a conviction under 41-5-206(6) was equivalent to any adult felony conviction and that there is nothing in the Montana Youth Court Act or the Criminally Convicted Youth Act that precludes the application of the PFO statutes and designation to an individual previously convicted of a felony when the individual was a youth. Citing St. v. Damon, 2005 MT 218, 328 M 276, 119 P3d 1194 (2005), the Supreme Court held that the District Court therefore had the authority to apply the PFO statutes and designation to Mainwaring. The Supreme Court also overruled Mainwaring's due process objections and affirmed his conviction. St. v. Mainwaring, 2007 MT 14, 335 M 322, 151 P3d 53 (2007).

Youth Court — Lack of Jurisdiction to Determine Place and Length of Commitment: B.L.T., a 15-year-old youth, was charged with theft, escape, and criminal mischief. The Youth Court ordered that B.L.T. be committed to the custody of the Department of Family Services (now Department of Corrections), with placement at Pine Hills until he reached the age of 18. The Supreme Court noted that 41-5-103 defines "legal custody" as including the right to determine "with whom the youth shall live and for what period". The Supreme Court noted that even though the Youth Court has continuing jurisdiction over a youth under 41-5-205, placement by the Youth Court is not tantamount to a sentence of imprisonment because the purpose of the Montana Youth Court Act is rehabilitation rather than punishment in a penal institution. This purpose is consistent with 41-5-523 (renumbered 41-5-1512), which allows the Department of Family Services (now Department of Corrections) to determine the place and length of placement of the youth. The Youth Court therefore had no authority to commit to Pine Hills for a specific period of time. In re B.L.T., 258 M 468, 853 P2d 1226, 50 St. Rep. 617 (1993).

Youth Not Denied Equal Protection by Sentencing System More Severe Than System Imposed on Adults: A youth has not been denied her right to equal protection of the law by imposition of a term of commitment upon her that is longer than the criminal sentence an adult would receive for the same act. Adults and minors are not similarly situated with respect to state sentencing laws because: (1) the purpose of their detention is not the same, that of the adult offender being both retributional and rehabilitational; and (2) the physical liberty interests of minors and adults are qualitatively different. In re C.S., 210 M 144, 687 P2d 57, 41 St. Rep. 970 (1984), followed in In re T.A.S., 244 M 259, 797 P2d 217, 47 St. Rep. 1590 (1990).

Juvenile — Traffic Violation — Guilty Plea — Ability to Waive Rights: The provisions of the Youth Court Act do not apply to traffic violations. The youth who was accused of failure to drive in a careful and prudent manner was not subject to a jail sentence if found guilty. He therefore did not have the right to counsel and could knowledgeably waive his rights without the presence of counsel or his parents. State ex rel. Maier v. City Court, 203 M 443, 662 P2d 276, 39 St. Rep. 1560 (1982).

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 436, L. 1995, provided: "WHEREAS, the Montana Youth Court Act is now 20 years old and has been both amended and litigated numerous times; and

WHEREAS, juvenile court and probation philosophy and practice have changed; and

WHEREAS, national attention has been focused on the issue of youth violence; and

WHEREAS, a performance audit report issued by the Legislative Auditor in June 1993 concluded that Montana's juvenile justice system suffers from a lack of coordination and that current reforms are occurring without a formal planning process; and

WHEREAS, the 54th Legislature will be asked to consider amending several major provisions of the Montana Youth Court Act; and

WHEREAS, it is important to strike a balance that protects the community from delinquent youth, imposes accountability for offenses, and equips juvenile offenders with the competencies to live productively in the community; and

WHEREAS, it is important to consider issues such as initiation of proceedings, jurisdiction and transfer, rights of youth, procedure before the youth courts, disposition, confidentiality, and mental health considerations in order to achieve a balance; and

WHEREAS, it is important that all services to youth in the juvenile justice system and mental health services delivery system be coordinated in a single, seamless continuum of care and treatment.

THEREFORE, the Legislature finds it appropriate that an interim commission be established and assigned to complete a comprehensive review and assessment of the Montana juvenile justice system and the mental health services delivery system for youth and develop a plan to ensure the effective and efficient delivery of services to all youth in those systems."

Juvenile Justice Study Commission: Chapter 436, L. 1995, provided: "Section 1. Juvenile justice study commission — composition — vacancies. (1) There is a juvenile justice study commission.

(2) The commission is composed of the following members:

(a) two members of the house of representatives, one from each party, appointed by the speaker of the house;

(b) two members of the senate, one from each party, appointed by the president of the senate;

(c) a citizen representing the public at large, appointed by the governor;

(d) a youth court judge, appointed by the governor;

(e) a justice of the peace, appointed by the governor from three candidates nominated by the Montana magistrates' association;

(f) a member of the youth justice advisory council, appointed by the governor from three candidates nominated by the board of crime control;

(g) a parent or guardian of a youth being treated or supervised, appointed by the governor;

(h) a juvenile probation officer appointed by the governor from three candidates nominated by the Montana juvenile probation officers association;

(i) a county attorney, appointed by the governor from three candidates nominated by the county attorneys association;

(j) a victim of a violent crime committed by a youth, appointed by the governor;

(k) a member of a private agency that provides treatment services to youth, appointed by the governor;

(l) a young adult who was formerly adjudicated to be a juvenile delinquent or youth in need of supervision [now youth in need of intervention], appointed by the governor; and

(m) one employee each of the department of family services [now department of public health and human services], the board of crime control, and the department of corrections and human services [now department of corrections], who shall serve as nonvoting members.

(3) The members of the commission shall elect a presiding officer from among the members.

(4) A vacancy occurring on the commission must be filled in the same manner as the original appointment.

Section 2. Meetings. (1) The presiding officer shall schedule meetings of the commission as considered necessary and shall give notice of the time and place of each meeting to the members of the commission. At least one meeting must be held in each mental health region.

(2) The commission may adopt rules of procedure for the conduct of its meetings.

Section 3. Reimbursement of expenses — compensation. (1) Each member of the commission, except the legislative members appointed under [section 1] [not codified], is entitled to reimbursement for expenses as provided in 2-18-501 through 2-18-503.

(2) A legislative member appointed under [section 1] [not codified] is entitled to compensation and expenses as provided in 5-2-302.

Section 4. Powers and duties — staff support — recommendations — report. (1) The commission shall make a thorough study of the juvenile justice system and youth mental health services delivery system. The study must include:

(a) a comprehensive review of past and present programs used to successfully rehabilitate youth and reduce juvenile crime;

(b) a review of methods and programs in other states and nations that have been documented as a success in treating and rehabilitating youth;

(c) the development of a juvenile justice and mental health treatment continuum that provides for community protection, youth accountability, youth competency, meaningful restitution, and successful reintegration of youth into the community;

(d) a definition and delineation of the roles and responsibilities of the department of family services [now department of public health and human services] and other state and local government agencies working with youth;

(e) a definition and delineation of the roles and responsibilities of the juvenile justice system and the youth mental health services delivery system; and

(f) a review of the effectiveness and efficiency of each state youth correctional facility and of each detention facility operated by the state, including the feasibility of privatizing each facility.

(2) The legislative council shall supply staff support to the commission.

(3) The commission is authorized to secure information of any type from any agency, board, or commission or from any independent organization. Any state agency, board, or commission shall supply information upon the request of the commission.

(4) On or before December 1, 1996, the commission shall submit to the 55th legislature a report of its findings and conclusions. The report must contain recommendations for legislation, including a draft of the proposed legislation. The report must also contain a discussion related to any area of study for which the commission does not recommend legislation and an explanation of why legislation is not recommended.

Section 5. Authority to accept funding — appropriation of federal funds. (1) The legislative council is authorized to accept funds appropriated from the board of crime control for the purpose of conducting the study identified in [section 4] [not codified].

(2) There is allocated to the legislative council from the youth justice advisory council $20,000 in funds granted to the state board of crime control for the youth justice council by the federal office of juvenile justice and delinquency prevention. The funds may be used only for fulfilling the duties of the commission, including:

(a) reimbursing or compensating the members as provided in [section 3] [not codified];

(b) contracting for services to execute the study to be conducted by the commission; and

(c) paying other expenses incurred by the commission or the legislative council in completing the study.

(3) Funds allocated to the legislative council on behalf of the commission but not expended prior to the termination date specified in [section 7] [not codified] must be returned to the youth justice advisory council within 60 days of the termination date.

(4) The funds identified in this section must be deposited in quarterly installments that are sufficient to meet the commission's costs for each quarter in an account in the state special revenue fund to the credit of the legislative council. The first installment must be deposited on or before July 1, 1995. The legislative council staff may not begin work on the study until the first installment has been deposited." The Commission was established July 1, 1995, and terminates June 30, 1997.

Case Notes

Family Travel and Counseling Expenses Properly Denied: A youth sentenced to a youth correctional facility requested funds to enable his family to visit at the facility and to participate in family counseling. The request was denied by the Youth Court, and the Supreme Court affirmed. Although one purpose of the Montana Youth Court Act is to preserve the unity and welfare of the family whenever possible, there is no provision for family travel expenses, and the Youth Court did not abuse its discretion in denying expenses absent a showing that: (1) family visits and counseling would be beneficial; (2) counseling was required; (3) funds were available; or (4) the Department of Corrections would not have made similar arrangements following disposition. In re N.V., 2004 MT 80, 320 M 442, 87 P3d 510 (2004).

2005 Amendment: Chapter 512 inserted (2)(d) relating to maintaining appropriate heritage upon removal from home; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 28, 2005.

1999 Amendment: Chapter 537 in (2) inserted "a system that does not seek retribution but that provides"; in (2)(b) inserted "for youth before they become adult offenders"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 30, 1999.

1995 Amendment: Chapter 528 at beginning of (2) substituted "to prevent and reduce youth delinquency through immediate, consistent, enforceable, and avoidable consequences of youths' actions and to establish a program" for "to remove from youth committing violations of the law the element of retribution and to substitute therefor a program" and after "rehabilitation" inserted "detention, competency development, community protection"; in (4) substituted "fair, accurate hearing" for "fair hearing"; and made minor changes in style.

Case Notes

Appropriate Conditions on Probation of Delinquent and Serious Youth Sex Offender: As a youth, D.A.S. was convicted of sexual assault and placed in a youth correctional facility. When D.A.S. turned 18, jurisdiction and supervisory responsibility were transferred from Youth Court to District Court until age 25, and numerous supervisory conditions were attached, including prohibitions on the use of drugs and alcohol, a curfew, and a requirement that D.A.S. obtain a GED 1 year prior to expiration of the sentence. D.A.S. objected to these conditions on grounds that they were unrelated to the crime of sexual assault, but the Supreme Court affirmed, applying St. v. Ashby, 2008 MT 83, 342, M 187, 179 P3d 1164 (2008), which allows imposition of conditions that have a nexus either to the offense or to the offender. In this case, both alcohol and drug prohibitions were reasonably related to D.A.S.'s rehabilitation and placement in a sexual offender program. A curfew was reasonable to ensure development of a consistent and healthy routine and was reasonable given legislative intent to provide youth offenders with additional supervision. Completion of the high school equivalency test was not an abuse of discretion because it was consistent with legislative intent to rehabilitate youth offenders through competency development, especially given D.A.S.'s expressed desire to further his education. In re D.A.S., 2008 MT 168, 343 M 360, 184 P3d 349 (2008).

Similar Purposes of Adult and Youth Sentencing Statutes Regarding Public Safety and Rehabilitation: In its transfer order, the Youth Court concluded that adult sentencing policies are similar to the sentencing purposes of the Montana Youth Court Act in that both are designed to ensure rehabilitation, accountability, and protection of the community. Spina contended that the conclusion was a misstatement of the law because the declaration of purpose in the Montana Youth Court Act does not promote accountability. The Supreme Court held that, although not identical, the statutes have similar purposes, including holding individuals accountable for their actions through the imposition of restitutionary measures. St. v. Spina, 1999 MT 113, 294 M 367, 982 P2d 421, 56 St. Rep. 467 (1999).

Youth Legally Capable of Committing Crime — Jurisdiction When Crime Disclosed After Majority: The District Court has jurisdiction to try an individual charged at age 22 for felonies allegedly committed at age 15, as provided in the court's constitutional grant of jurisdiction over all felonies. The Youth Court Act does not contain any direct statement or implication that the Legislature intended to set the minimum age of criminal responsibility at 16, making a 15-year-old incapable of committing a crime. The primary purposes of statutes defining a "delinquent youth" and providing for transfer to District Court are to clarify that delinquency proceedings are noncriminal and to prohibit prosecution of youths in District Court while they are youths. State ex rel. Elliot v. District Court, 211 M 1, 684 P2d 481, 41 St. Rep. 1184 (1984).

Predetention Hearing: The facts of this case did not demonstrate a violation of this statute by the youth court's denial of assistance of available counsel in a predetention hearing. In re Marten, 174 M 343, 570 P2d 1122 (1977).

Dispositional Stage — Fitness of Parents: At the dispositional stage the concern for the best interests of the youth and community is paramount. The court need not, therefore, make specific findings as to the fitness of the parents. In re Geary, 172 M 204, 562 P2d 821 (1977).

Repeal of Conflicting Laws: By the enactment of Ch. 227, L. 1943 (now repealed), and its amendments covering juveniles and creating juvenile courts, the Legislature intended to repeal all prior laws in conflict therewith and amended the general criminal code insofar as it conflicts with the statutes relating to juveniles. State ex rel. Dahl v. District Court, 134 M 395, 333 P2d 495 (1958).

Disqualification of Judge: Section 93-901, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed), which governed the removal of judges in civil actions and matters, applies to juvenile delinquency proceedings as it is the legislative intent that delinquency proceedings are to be treated as civil proceedings. State ex rel. Ostoj v. McClernan, 129 M 160, 284 P2d 252 (1955).

Paternal Nature of Proceedings: Proceedings under the juvenile delinquency law, section 10-601, et seq., R.C.M. 1947 (since repealed), are in no sense criminal, as the law does not contemplate punishment for an offense committed by an erring minor. The law is no more than an administrative police regulation for the saving of the child and the protection of society. In administering it the courts act more in a paternal than in a judicial capacity, and the proceedings to be conducted under the act are exclusive. State ex rel. Palagi v. Freeman, 81 M 132, 262 P 168 (1927).

Chapter 326 inserted definition of juvenile home arrest officer; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1999.

Chapter 532 inserted definition of criminally convicted youth; in definition of detention inserted (c) concerning violation of parole agreement; in definition of victim in (a) substituted "criminal offense" for "felony offense"; in definition of youth detention facility inserted (a)(ii) concerning collocated secure detention facility; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 1999.

1997 Amendments: Chapter 42 in definition of state youth correctional facility, at end, deleted reference to Mountain View School in Helena; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective March 12, 1997.

Chapter 189 in definition of state youth correctional facility, after "Pine Hills", substituted "youth correctional facility" for "school" and after "Miles City" deleted "and the Mountain View school in Helena".

Chapter 286 in definition of final disposition, at end, inserted reference to 41-5-1513; in definition of foster home substituted "department of public health and human services" for "department"; deleted definition of guardianship that read: ""Guardianship" means the status created and defined by law between a youth and an adult with the reciprocal rights, duties, and responsibilities"; inserted definition of guardian; in definition of probable cause hearing substituted "41-5-332" for "41-5-303"; in definition of shelter care facility substituted "41-5-347" for "41-5-306(1)"; in definition of short-term detention center after "not to exceed 96 hours" inserted "excluding weekends and legal holidays"; in definition of state youth correctional facility, after "Pine Hills school [see Ch. 189 amendment] in Miles City", deleted "and the Mountain View school in Helena"; and made minor changes in style.

Chapter 550 inserted definition of assessment officer; substituted definition of delinquent youth for former definition that read: ""Delinquent youth" means a youth:

(a) who has committed an offense that, if committed by an adult, would constitute a criminal offense; or

(b) who, having been placed on probation as a delinquent youth or a youth in need of supervision, violates any condition of probation"; in definition of detention inserted (b) including "contempt of court or violation of a valid court order"; inserted definition of family; in definition of final disposition inserted references to 41-5-1422, 41-5-1503, 41-5-1504, 41-5-1513, and 41-5-1522 through 41-5-1525; in definition of foster home, after "department", inserted "of public health and human services"; deleted definition of guardianship that read: ""Guardianship" means the status created and defined by law between a youth and an adult with the reciprocal rights, duties, and responsibilities"; inserted definition of guardian; inserted definition of habitual truancy; at end of definition of jail inserted "but does not include a collocated juvenile detention facility that complies with 28 CFR, part 31"; in definition of restitution substituted "pursuant to a consent adjustment" for "pursuant to an informal adjustment"; inserted definition of running away from home; in definition of secure detention facility, in (a), inserted "or as a sanction for contempt of court, violation of a parole agreement, or violation of a valid court order"; in definition of shelter care facility substituted "41-5-306(1)(a)" (renumbered 41-5-344) for "41-5-306(1)"; in definition of short-term detention center substituted "a period not to exceed 10 days" for "a period not to exceed 96 hours" and inserted "youth assessment center"; in definition of state youth correctional facility, after "Pine Hills school [see Ch. 189 amendment] in Miles City", deleted "and the Mountain View school in Helena"; inserted definition of victim; inserted definition of youth assessment; inserted definition of youth assessment center; inserted definition of youth care facility; in definition of Youth Court substituted "youth in need of intervention" for "youth in need of supervision" and inserted "and assessment officers"; in definition of youth detention facility, at end of (b), inserted "or as a sanction for contempt of court, violation of a parole agreement, or violation of a valid court order"; substituted youth in need of intervention for youth in need of supervision as defined term and after "who" inserted "is adjudicated as a youth and who", in (a) substituted "law regarding alcoholic beverages" for "law regarding use of alcoholic beverages by minors", in (b) inserted reference to running away from home or habitual truancy, and in (c) substituted "youth in need of intervention" for "youth in need of supervision"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1997.

Saving Clause: Section 50, Ch. 286, L. 1997, was a saving clause.

Section 79, Ch. 550, L. 1997, was a saving clause.

Severability: Section 80, Ch. 550, L. 1997, was a severability clause.

Applicability: Section 51, Ch. 286, L. 1997, provided: "[This act] applies to proceedings commenced after [the effective date of this act]." Effective October 1, 1997.

1995 Amendment: Chapter 546 in definition of Department substituted "department of corrections provided for in 2-15-2301" for "department of family services provided for in 2-15-2401"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1995.

Saving Clause: Section 571, Ch. 546, L. 1995, was a saving clause.

1991 Amendments: Chapter 231 in definition of youth in need of supervision, in (b), substituted "continues to exhibit behavior beyond the control" for "habitually disobeys the reasonable and lawful demands" and after "or guardian" substituted language relating to attempt to mediate, resolve, or control youth's behavior for "or is ungovernable and beyond their control" and deleted former (c) that read: "(c) being subject to compulsory school attendance, is habitually truant from school"; and made minor change in style.

Chapter 547 inserted definitions of final disposition, jail, shelter care facility, and youth detention facility; substituted definition of detention for former definition that read: ""Detention" means the temporary substitute care of youth in physically restricting facilities"; in definition of youth in need of supervision, in (b) before "beyond control", deleted "ungovernable and" (language reinserted pursuant to sec. 29, Ch. 799, L. 1991, a coordination instruction and rendered void by Ch. 231); and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1992. Because the amendments made by this chapter were also contained in the other chapters amending this section, only one version was codified.

Chapter 548 inserted definitions of correctional facility, final disposition, jail, secure detention facility, shelter care facility, and youth detention facility; substituted definition of detention for former definition that read: ""Detention" means the temporary substitute care of youth in physically restricting facilities"; in definition of youth in need of supervision, in (b) before "beyond control", deleted "ungovernable and" (language reinserted pursuant to sec. 29, Ch. 799, L. 1991, a coordination instruction and rendered void by Ch. 231); and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 23, 1991.

Chapter 799 inserted definitions of final disposition, holdover, jail, probable cause hearing, regional detention facility, shelter care facility, short-term detention center, and youth detention facility; substituted definition of detention for former definition that read: ""Detention" means the temporary substitute care of youth in physically restricting facilities"; in definition of detention facility inserted second sentence enumerating facilities; in definition of state youth correctional facility, before "rehabilitation", inserted "placement and"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1991.

1991 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 799, L. 1991, provided: "A statement of intent is required for this bill because [section 14] [41-5-1008, renumbered 41-5-1908] grants the board of crime control authority to adopt rules necessary to implement provisions of this bill.

It is the intent of the legislature, in enacting this bill, to provide alternatives to the detention of youth in adult jails in order to meet the requirements of Senate Bill No. 38, which prohibits the detention of youth in adult jails.

In order to ensure that alternatives to jail are established, the legislature intends that each county have the primary responsibility to provide youth detention services, as required by [section 2] [41-5-810, renumbered 41-5-1803]. In addition, in order to stimulate the development of needed services, the legislature intends to provide state grants authorized in [section 8] [41-5-1002, renumbered 41-5-1902], using state and federal funds, to assist counties in providing a spectrum of services for the detention and care of youth. These services are intended to include but are not limited to youth detention facilities, short-term detention centers, holdovers, attendant care, home detention, and programs for the transportation of youth to regional detention facilities.

The legislature intends that counties receiving state grants should share in the costs of services in order to prevent excessive utilization of services and to give counties a financial incentive to hold down program costs. For this reason, [section 10] [41-5-1004, renumbered 41-5-1904] requires that state grants be provided on a matching basis or, if in a block grant, based on a percentage of the approved cost of services.

In order to discourage the use of secure detention and to promote the use of less costly, nonsecure community-based programs, the legislature intends to provide state grants to counties at a higher rate of payment for such services, including holdovers, attendant care, and other alternatives to secure detention.

The legislature further intends that, as a condition of receiving state grants under [section 8] [41-5-1002, renumbered 41-5-1902], each county shall develop a written plan for providing youth detention services, including alternatives to secure detention. The development of county plans is required to ensure that formal planning does, in fact, occur and to make certain that state grants are not provided for services that are not well planned in advance.

As a further condition of receiving state grants under [section 8] [41-5-1002, renumbered 41-5-1902], each county shall, within a reasonable period of time, demonstrate compliance or substantial compliance with state law and policies contained in the Montana Youth Court Act relating to the detention and placement of youth. The legislature intends that the board of crime control review and monitor counties receiving grants under [section 8] [41-5-1002, renumbered 41-5-1902] to assure compliance or substantial compliance with the Montana Youth Court Act.

Finally, the legislature intends that the board of crime control adopt rules as authorized in [section 14] [41-5-1008, renumbered 41-5-1908]. In adopting rules, the board may:

(1) establish requirements for approved holdovers consistent with the definition of holdovers provided in 41-5-103(13);

(2) designate geographical areas of the state that are eligible for creation of a youth detention region under [section 4] [41-5-812, renumbered 41-5-1805]. In designating these areas, the board shall use available state data showing the number of youth held in detention in each county of the state.

(3) adopt procedures governing the distribution and allocation of funds in accordance with [sections 10 and 11] [41-5-1004 and 41-5-1005, renumbered 41-5-1904 and 41-5-1905];

(4) provide a system to review and monitor counties under [section 9] [41-5-1003, renumbered 41-5-1903] to assure that counties receiving grants are in compliance or substantial compliance with the Montana Youth Court Act;

(5) provide standards for determining compliance or substantial compliance with the Montana Youth Court Act pursuant to [section 9] [41-5-1003, renumbered 41-5-1903]. These standards should be based upon comparable standards for compliance with sections 223(a)(12) and 223(a)(14) of the federal Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention Act of 1974.

(6) establish a process for providing notice and fair hearings required under [section 9] [41-5-1003, renumbered 41-5-1903] in order to terminate state grants to counties that fail to attain compliance or substantial compliance with the Montana Youth Court Act."

1987 Amendments: Chapter 475 inserted definition of detention facility.

Chapter 515 in (14)(b), after "parents", inserted "foster parents, physical custodian".

Chapter 609 inserted definition of Department as Department of Family Services; in (6), after "residence", substituted "licensed by the department" for "approved by the court"; at end of (12) deleted reference to Youth Court and inserted reference to Youth Court Judge; at end of (22) substituted "pursuant to an informal adjustment, consent decree, or other youth court order" for "under the jurisdiction of a youth court proceeding"; deleted last sentence of (23) that read: "Nothing in this definition is intended to include juvenile correctional facilities, evaluation facilities, mental health facilities and services, and aftercare programs operated by the department of institutions"; and inserted definition of serious juvenile offender.

1983 Amendments: Chapter 233, at end of (17), deleted "and Swan River youth forest camp".

Chapter 465 made the following changes: in (2), substituted present definition for "the department of institutions, the department of social and rehabilitation services, and any division or department of either"; in (18) and (19) inserted "substitute" after "temporary"; deleted former (20), which read: "District youth guidance home means a family-oriented residence established in a judicial district of the state of Montana as an alternative to existing state youth correctional facilities, the function of which is to provide a home and guidance through adult supervision for delinquent youths and youths in need of supervision."; and inserted definition of substitute care.

Case Notes

Valuation of Damaged Automobile of "At Least $1,000" in Youth Court Held Insufficient to Support Adjudication as Delinquent Youth — Failure to Develop Argument in Brief: J.D.N. was adjudicated in Youth Court of damaging an automobile that the court valued to be of "at least $1,000" for the purposes of 45-6-101. The court concluded that J.D.N. committed felony criminal mischief and was therefore adjudicated to be a delinquent youth under 41-5-1502. J.D.N. argued that the finding by the court that the vehicle was worth "at least $1,000" was insufficient to support an adjudication that he was a delinquent youth as defined in 41-5-103. The Supreme Court agreed, noting that the criminal mischief statute uses the language "in excess of $1,000." The Supreme Court therefore remanded the case to the Youth Court and directed a disposition consistent with the finding that J.D.N. committed an offense that, if committed by an adult, would be a misdemeanor. The court declined to enter an order dismissing the petition charging J.D.N. to be a delinquent youth, saying that J.D.N. had failed to develop an argument for that result in his brief and that the court would not do it for him, citing St. v. Torgerson, 2008 MT 303, 345 M 532, 192 P3d 695 (2008). In re J.D.N., 2008 MT 420, 347 M 368, 199 P3d 189 (2008).

Youth Court — Lack of Jurisdiction to Determine Place and Length of Commitment: B.L.T., a 15-year-old youth, was charged with theft, escape, and criminal mischief. The Youth Court ordered that B.L.T. be committed to the custody of the Department of Family Services (now Department of Corrections), with placement at Pine Hills until he reached the age of 18. The Supreme Court noted that this section defines "legal custody" as including the right to determine "with whom the youth shall live and for what period". The Supreme Court noted that even though the Youth Court has continuing jurisdiction over a youth under 41-5-205, placement by the Youth Court is not tantamount to a sentence of imprisonment because the purpose of the Montana Youth Court Act is rehabilitation rather than punishment in a penal institution. This purpose is consistent with 41-5-523 (renumbered 41-5-1512), which allows the Department of Family Services (now Department of Corrections) to determine the place and length of placement of the youth. The Youth Court therefore had no authority to commit to Pine Hills for a specific period of time. In re B.L.T., 258 M 468, 853 P2d 1226, 50 St. Rep. 617 (1993).

Youth Properly Adjudicated Delinquent Improperly Committed to Correctional Facility: H.F. violated the terms of her probation by violating curfew and using alcohol. She was adjudged a delinquent youth and placed in the custody of the Department of Family Services (now Department of Corrections) until age 19. H.F. was also placed in a youth correctional facility on the basis of being a serious juvenile offender. The Supreme Court held that the youth had properly been designated a delinquent youth and placed in the Department's custody. However, the acts that constituted a violation of her probation were not the serious acts set out in the statutory definition of a serious juvenile offender. Therefore, the Youth Court was without authority to place her in a correctional facility. In re H.F., 242 M 381, 791 P2d 53, 47 St. Rep. 826 (1990).

Youth Violating Probation Conditions: H.F.'s mother filed a complaint charging the youth with ungovernable behavior. H.F. entered into a consent agreement that established 13 rules of probation. The youth subsequently violated several of the rules, was adjudicated a delinquent youth, and was committed to the Department of Family Services (now Department of Corrections) until the age of 19. The Supreme Court held that H.F. had been properly designated a delinquent youth because one of the statutory grounds for such adjudication is violation of parole. In re H.F., 242 M 381, 791 P2d 53, 47 St. Rep. 757 (1990).

"Delinquent Youth" — Felony Basis: The Youth Court's finding that the youth had committed a deliberate homicide, although based entirely on circumstantial evidence, was supported by substantial evidence in the record and therefore was sufficient to support a finding that he was a delinquent youth within the meaning of 41-5-103. St. v. Twoteeth, 219 M 101, 711 P2d 789, 42 St. Rep. 1873 (1985).

Youth Legally Capable of Committing Crime — Jurisdiction When Crime Disclosed After Majority: The District Court has jurisdiction to try an individual charged at age 22 for felonies allegedly committed at age 15, as provided in the court's constitutional grant of jurisdiction over all felonies. The Youth Court Act does not contain any direct statement or implication that the Legislature intended to set the minimum age of criminal responsibility at 16, making a 15-year-old incapable of committing a crime. The primary purposes of statutes defining a "delinquent youth" and providing for transfer to District Court are to clarify that delinquency proceedings are noncriminal and to prohibit prosecution of youths in District Court while they are youths. State ex rel. Elliot v. District Court, 211 M 1, 684 P2d 481, 41 St. Rep. 1184 (1984).

Youth in Need of Supervision (Now Youth in Need of Intervention) Who Violates Probation by Truancy Adjudged Delinquent Youth: The Montana Youth Court Act, which allows a youth in need of supervision (now youth in need of intervention) who has violated probation to be adjudged a delinquent youth, is not unconstitutional as violative of the due process, equal protection, or cruel and unusual punishment provisions of the United States and Montana Constitutions. The Supreme Court rejected appellant's assertion that a juvenile status offender who violated the terms of her probation by truancy should not be considered a delinquent youth and subjected to greater punishment for the same conduct which originally gave the Youth Court authority to designate her a youth in need of supervision (now youth in need of intervention). In re C.H., 210 M 184, 683 P2d 931, 41 St. Rep. 997 (1984).

"Delinquent Youth": The Youth Court's finding that the youth had committed a burglary, a charge which the youth admitted and which was supported by the evidence, was sufficient to support a finding that he was a delinquent youth within the meaning of 41-5-103. In re V.R.B., 201 M 127, 653 P2d 133, 39 St. Rep. 2001 (1982).

Dispositional Stage — Fitness of Parents: At the dispositional stage the concern for the best interests of the youth and community is paramount. The court need not, therefore, make specific findings as to the fitness of the parents. In re Geary, 172 M 204, 562 P2d 821 (1977).

Citation to Parents: Although youths admitted violations contained in the petition while on the stand, court was without jurisdiction to order commitment where second hearing proceeded upon citation to parents that was not in compliance with section 10-606, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed). St. v. Johnson, 141 M 1, 374 P2d 504 (1962).

Criminal Court Jurisdiction: The words "and carrying a deadly weapon or weapons with intent to assault" do not modify robbery or any of the other specifically listed crimes; therefore, as to the crime of robbery, possession of a weapon need not be charged. State ex rel. Keast v. District Court, 136 M 367, 348 P2d 135 (1959). (Dissenting opinion, 136 M 367, 348 P2d 135 (1959).)

Age Controlling Element: The controlling element in juvenile laws is age, not minority. Section 12276, R.C.M. 1921 (now repealed), relating to juvenile delinquents, reveals the legislative intention to include rather than exclude married minors. Marriage releases a child from parental authority, but it does not change the status of a child from that of a minor to that of an adult. State ex rel. Foot v. District Court, 77 M 290, 250 P 973, 49 ALR 398 (1926).

Delinquent Youth Charge for Probation Violation: A youth in need of supervision (now youth in need of intervention) who violates probation could be charged by petition as a delinquent youth under the definition of a delinquent youth in this section and could then be committed for a period of more than 6 months. Case Notes

Absence of Youth Court Procedure to Determine Competency of Youths Not Violative of Equal Protection: Attorneys for a 9-year-old youth charged with arson contended that the youth lacked the capacity to form the requisite mental intent to commit the crime and that the youth was too young to understand the process against him and to effectively assist in his defense. A motion was made to dismiss. The Youth Court determined that the youth understood the charges and his rights and sentenced the youth to 2 years' probation. On appeal, the youth asserted that the Youth Court Act violated the constitutional guarantee of equal protection by not providing a procedure to evaluate the competency of youths similar to the procedure for determining the competency of adults to stand trial. The Supreme Court disagreed. A youth alleging incompetency based on immaturity is not similarly situated to an adult criminal defendant alleging mental disease or defect. All youths experience a period of immaturity, which most youths outgrow, but the same cannot be said for a mental disease or defect. The court noted that the logical extension of the youth's argument would require that immature youths be placed in mental health facilities until they are mature enough to stand trial. Because immature youths are not similarly situated to adult criminal defendants alleging mental disease or defect, equal protection was not implicated. In this case, substantial evidence indicated that the youth could consult with his attorneys and understand the proceedings against him and that the youth could form the requisite criminal intent of purposely and knowingly starting a fire. The youth was fit to proceed and did not suffer from a mental disorder, and the youth's due process rights were protected by hearings at which the youth's competency to proceed was determined. The Youth Court was affirmed. In re G.T.M., 2009 MT 443, 354 M 197, 222 P3d 626 (2009). See also State ex rel. Elliot v. District Court, 211 M 1, 684 P2d 481 (1984).

Youth Court Adjudication Not Considered Conviction — No Authority to Require Adjudicated Youth to Register as Sexual or Violent Offender Under Pre-2007 Law: In 1998, 16-year-old Hastings was adjudicated a delinquent youth in Youth Court, admitting one offense of sexual intercourse without consent, and was committed to the Department of Corrections (DOC). When Hastings turned 18 in 2000, his case was transferred to District Court until age 25 based on the parties' stipulation that Hastings had not completed sex offender treatment or paid restitution and was at high risk to reoffend. The District Court then determined that Hastings had violated the conditions of the Youth Court order and committed Hastings to the DOC and also required that Hastings register as a level 2 sex offender. Hastings initially registered as a sex offender, but failed to update registration after moving and was subsequently charged with failure to maintain registration. Hastings moved to dismiss the charge, asserting that he had not been convicted of a sexual offense and that neither the commitment order nor statutes required him to register after discharging his sentence. The motion was denied, and Hastings appealed. The Supreme Court reversed. Although the Youth Court had the authority to require sex offender registration pursuant to 41-5-1513, no requirement was made in this case. Because the Youth Court adjudication did not constitute a conviction, the District Court could not impose registration requirements under 46-18-201. (Note that the 2007 Legislature amended 46-23-502 to include an adjudicated youth in the definition of a sexual or violent offender.) The District Court's opinion that 41-5-1513 suggests a wholesale incorporation of sexual offender registry into the Montana Youth Court Act was erroneous, and absent statutory authority, a court may not impose a registration requirement. Failure to grant Hastings' motion to dismiss was error, and the case was remanded for dismissal. St. v. Hastings, 2007 MT 294, 340 M 1, 171 P3d 726 (2007), distinguishing St. v. Mount, 2003 MT 275, 317 M 481, 78 P3d 829 (2003), and St. v. Villanueva, 2005 MT 192, 328 M 135, 118 P3d 179 (2005).

Washington Youth Sexual Offender Required to Register as Sexual or Violent Offender if Residing in Montana: At age 15, Villanueva was adjudicated guilty of first degree rape in Washington state and was later required to register for life in that state as a sexual offender. Villanueva subsequently moved to Montana where he resided for 6 weeks. After being arrested for a domestic disturbance, it was discovered that Villanueva had not registered as a sexual or violent offender in Montana, and he was charged with failure to register. Villanueva contended that Montana law did not apply to his Washington registration requirement because he did not meet the definition of sexual or violent offender under 46-23-502 and because a 1989 Attorney General's opinion held that juveniles adjudicated delinquent under the Montana Youth Court Act whose cases have not been transferred to District Court are not required to register. Villanueva moved to dismiss the charge, but the District Court denied the motion. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Although the Washington definition of sexual offender may not have been identical to the Montana definition, Villanueva was nevertheless a sexual offender under Washington law and was therefore required to register in Montana under 46-23-504. Further, Villanueva could not rely on the Attorney General's opinion because he was not adjudicated under the Montana Youth Court Act. The Supreme Court noted that the Washington sexual offender registration law also required Villanueva to register in another state if he changed state residency, so under both Washington and Montana law, Villanueva was required to register as a sexual offender. Villanueva's motion to dismiss was properly denied. St. v. Villanueva, 2005 MT 192, 328 M 135, 118 P3d 179 (2005).

Youth Legally Capable of Committing Crime — Jurisdiction When Crime Disclosed After Majority: The District Court has jurisdiction to try an individual charged at age 22 for felonies allegedly committed at age 15, as provided in the court's constitutional grant of jurisdiction over all felonies. The Youth Court Act does not contain any direct statement or implication that the Legislature intended to set the minimum age of criminal responsibility at 16, making a 15-year-old incapable of committing a crime. The primary purposes of statutes defining a "delinquent youth" and providing for transfer to District Court are to clarify that delinquency proceedings are noncriminal and to prohibit prosecution of youths in District Court while they are youths. State ex rel. Elliot v. District Court, 211 M 1, 684 P2d 481, 41 St. Rep. 1184 (1984).

Evidence and Disposition — Admission in Criminal Proceeding — Reversible Error: On appeal by defendant following his conviction, the Supreme Court held that evidence given in a Youth Court proceeding against a juvenile and evidence of the disposition of the juvenile in such a proceeding are to be excluded for all purposes. It was reversible error requiring a new trial when, upon cross-examination of defendant's character witness, the prosecutor asked the witness if he knew of a charge of attempted rape when defendant was 15 years old and service of 6 months' probation. The questions of the prosecutor in regard to the juvenile proceedings were evidence and inadmissible. St. v. Holzworth, 201 M 54, 651 P2d 1255, 39 St. Rep. 1949 (1982).

County, Not State, Required to Fund Legal Expenses of Indigent Juvenile Under Youth Court Act: Youth Court defense expenses are not included in 3-5-901 as a specific expense that the state is required to fund; thus, the Legislature did not intend the state to be responsible for funding Youth Court expenses. Rather, pursuant to 41-5-104 (now repealed) and this section, the Board of County Commissioners is required to fund the legal defense expenses of an indigent youth against whom a petition has been filed in Youth Court. 48 A.G. Case Notes

No Absolute Right to Counsel at Placement Hearing — Due Process: A delinquent youth was not denied due process when, pursuant to 41-5-523 (renumbered 41-5-1512), he was placed in a youth incarceration facility without an adversarial hearing to decide his placement. Beyond commitment of the youth by the Youth Court, the delinquent youth has no absolute right to counsel at the placement hearing. However, the youth is not without due process rights at the hearing stage. A youth placement committee created by this section (formerly 41-5-525) makes a recommendation to the Department of Family Services (now Department of Corrections), which can accept or reject the recommendation under 41-5-527 (renumbered 41-5-123, now repealed). In addition, the Youth Court can modify that decision if placement is not in the best interests of the child. In re Peterson, 235 M 313, 767 P2d 319, 46 St. Rep. 13 (1989).

Transfer of Child Proceeding From Montana Court to Tribal Court — Due Process Requirements: One of the purposes of the Indian Child Welfare Act, 25 U.S.C. §1901, et seq., is to ensure due process for all those involved, which requires a Montana court, when entertaining a tribal court motion for transfer to the tribal court of jurisdiction of children who are the subject of a Montana court proceeding, to hold a hearing on the transfer request and give a parent who claims indigency an appointed counsel if the court finds indigency. Code Commissioner Change: Section 76, Ch. 550, L. 1997, instructed the Code Commissioner, in the Montana Code Annotated or in legislation enacted by the 1997 Legislature, to change references to youth in need of supervision to references to youth in need of intervention. The change has been made in this section.

Saving Clause: Section 79, Ch. 550, L. 1997, was a saving clause.

1995 Amendment: Chapter 376 in (2) inserted "tobacco products".

1993 Amendment: Chapter 626 in (2), after "beverage", inserted "and gambling".

Case Notes

Minor's Prior DUI in City Court Properly Applied to Felony DUI Charge — No Violation of Constitutional Rights in City Court: Allen was arrested for a felony fourth DUI in 2004. Calculation of the number of DUIs included Allen's first arrest in 1997 as a minor, to which Allen pleaded guilty in City Court. Allen contended that it was improper to include the 1997 conviction in the total because that conviction was constitutionally infirm in that the City Court failed to advise him of his rights, including the right to counsel, and accepted his guilty plea without consent of a parent. Allen further contended that as a minor he was incapable of knowingly, voluntarily, and intelligently waiving the right to counsel. The Supreme Court disagreed. City Court records provided direct evidence that Allen's 1997 conviction was not obtained in violation of Allen's constitutional rights, and Allen failed to rebut the presumption of regularity that attached to the 1997 conviction. With specific regard to the right to counsel argument, the court noted that because the Youth Court does not have concurrent jurisdiction with the City Court over traffic violations, including DUIs, Allen was incorrect in claiming that the right to counsel could only have been waived by Allen and a parent at the 1997 proceedings. Therefore, application of Allen's 1997 conviction in calculating a felony DUI was not error. St. v. Allen, 2009 MT 124, 350 M 204, 206 P3d 951 (2009).

No Youth Court Authority to Expunge DUI Offenses — Elements of Judicial Estoppel Not Met: Following Darrah's completion of a Youth Drug Court program in 2004, the Youth Court ordered that Darrah's prior criminal record be expunged, including a previous minor in possession offense and a 2002 DUI. Darrah was subsequently charged in 2005 with second offense DUI, based on the prior 2002 DUI, and in 2006 Darrah was charged with third offense DUI. Citing the principle of judicial estoppel, Darrah asserted that because the Youth Court record had been expunged, the 2002 DUI should not count against him. The District Court disagreed and Darrah appealed. The Supreme Court applied the elements of judicial estoppel set out in Vogel v. Intercontinental Truck Body, Inc., 2006 MT 131, 332 M 322, 137 P3d 573 (2006), and determined that Darrah had failed to demonstrate that each element was met, so judicial estoppel did not apply. Further, there is no authority under which the Youth Court could order expungement of Darrah's DUI offenses. The District Court was affirmed. St. v. Darrah, 2009 MT 96, 350 M 70, 205 P3d 792 (2009), following St. v. Chesley, 2004 MT 165, 322 M 26, 92 P3d 1212 (2004).

Due Process Satisfied by Requiring Hearing After Information Filed — Butler Overruled: In St. v. Butler, 1999 MT 70, 294 M 17, 977 P2d 1000 (1999), the Supreme Court held that to satisfy due process, a youth must be afforded a hearing prior to the filing of an information in District Court to charge the youth as an adult. Subsequent amendment to 41-5-206 established a transfer hearing requirement within 30 days after leave to file an information is granted. The amendment was held to satisfy due process, so to the extent that Butler required a hearing before filing in District Court, Butler was overruled. St. v. McKee, 2006 MT 5, 330 M 249, 127 P3d 445 (2006).

Direct Filing of Information in District Court Rather Than Filing in Youth Court Violative of Due Process — Probable Cause Hearing Required: Pursuant to 41-5-206, Butler, a youth, was charged in District Court with attempted deliberate homicide and attempted robbery. Butler moved to have the District Court declare 41-5-206 unconstitutional on grounds that it violated his right to due process by allowing the prosecution to file an information directly in District Court rather than Youth Court without first affording him a hearing. The motion was denied, and Butler appealed. Although it is within the province of the prosecution to move the District Court for leave to file an information in that court if the youth has attained a certain age and is alleged to have committed certain unlawful conduct, the prosecution's discretion ends at that point. Absent a pure prosecutorial waiver system, the ultimate decision rests with the District Court, which must make specific findings that there is probable cause to believe the youth committed the offense and that, because of the seriousness of the offense, the case should be filed in District Court. In Butler's case, the District Court based its decision solely on the affidavit of the prosecution and Butler did not have the opportunity, with assistance of counsel, to challenge the specific findings of the court. Although declining to declare the entire statute unconstitutional, the Supreme Court cited Kent v. U.S., 383 US 541, 16 L Ed 2d 84, 86 S Ct 1045

(1966), in holding that because the decision in this regard is potentially critically important to the youth, under the 14th amendment to the United States Constitution, Butler's right to due process requires that the District Court hold a hearing when rendering a decision under 41-5-206(3). St. v. Butler, 1999 MT 70, 294 M 17, 977 P2d 1000, 56 St. Rep. 291 (1999), followed and applied retroactively in St. v. O'Neill, 1999 MT 224, 296 M 71, 985 P2d 154, 56 St. Rep. 886 (1999). Butler was overruled, to the extent that it requires a hearing before filing in District Court, in St. v. McKee, 2006 MT 5, 330 M 249, 127 P3d 445 (2006).

Termination of Youth Court Jurisdiction — No Bar to Jurisdiction of District Court: The defendant was under 18 years of age when the crime of which he was accused was committed. When the defendant was 20 years old he confessed, and the County Attorney filed a petition in the Youth Court, seeking a declaration that the defendant was a delinquent youth and requesting authority to incarcerate him. The defendant turned 21 before the motion was ruled on. He then was charged with deliberate homicide in District Court. The defendant contended that when the Youth Court lost jurisdiction over him under 41-5-205, the District Court did not have jurisdiction because once jurisdiction has attached under 41-5-203, the District Court can never assume jurisdiction over the offense underlying the Youth Court's proceeding absent transfer under 41-5-206, which did not occur here. The Supreme Court held that on termination of Youth Court jurisdiction, there was no bar to the exercise of jurisdiction by the District Court under Art. VII, sec. 4(1), Mont. Const., 3-5-302, and 46-2-201, over felony proceedings against the defendant. Exclusive original jurisdiction of the Youth Court does not divest a District Court of jurisdiction over crimes committed by a juvenile defendant. St. v. Beach, 217 M 132, 705 P2d 94, 42 St. Rep. 1080 (1985).

Youth Court — Prosecution of Felonies: In two cases pending in the Youth Court, two youths, ages 14 and 15, were charged with numerous felony counts. The State sought to arrest the proceeding in order to move that the youths be transferred to the jurisdiction of the District Court under 41-5-206. The State contends that the requirement for transfer contained in that statute effectively gives the Youth Court all jurisdiction over all felony criminal cases if the youth charged is less than 16 years old and that this provision conflicts with Art. VII, sec. 4(1), Mont. Const., which provides for District Court jurisdiction. The State also contends that this constitutional provision gives the District Court exclusive jurisdiction in all criminal cases amounting to a felony and that a youth under 16 years is legally capable of committing a felony. In denying the state's application for relief, the Supreme Court held that: (1) the term "original jurisdiction", as used in that section of the constitution, does not mean exclusive jurisdiction; and (2) felonies may be prosecuted in the Youth Court because when it acts in jurisdiction it is acting as a District Court. In re T.L.G. & M.E.H., 214 M 164, 692 P2d 1227, 41 St. Rep. 2388 (1984).

Youth Legally Capable of Committing Crime — Jurisdiction When Crime Disclosed After Majority: The District Court has jurisdiction to try an individual charged at age 22 for felonies allegedly committed at age 15, as provided in the court's constitutional grant of jurisdiction over all felonies. The Youth Court Act does not contain any direct statement or implication that the Legislature intended to set the minimum age of criminal responsibility at 16, making a 15-year-old incapable of committing a crime. The primary purposes of statutes defining a "delinquent youth" and providing for transfer to District Court are to clarify that delinquency proceedings are noncriminal and to prohibit prosecution of youths in District Court while they are youths. State ex rel. Elliot v. District Court, 211 M 1, 684 P2d 481, 41 St. Rep. 1184 (1984).

Traffic Offenses by Youths — Jurisdiction: Section 61-12-601 (now repealed), giving District Courts, Justices' Courts, and Municipal and City Courts concurrent original jurisdiction of all proceedings concerning unlawful operation of motor vehicles by persons under the age of 18, does not give jurisdiction to Youth Courts or grant the named courts jurisdiction concurrent with Youth Courts. Youth Court jurisdiction is fixed by 41-5-203, which specifically excludes traffic violations. State ex rel. Maier v. City Court, 203 M 443, 662 P2d 276, 40 St. Rep. 560 (1983).

Possession of Alcohol by Youth — Prosecutor's Choice of Forum: In light of 45-5-624, the County Attorney has sole discretion over which court (Justice's or Youth Court) hears a case involving illegal possession of alcohol by a minor. Edward v. Collings, 193 M 426, 632 P2d 325, 38 St. Rep. 1240 (1981).

Jurisdiction Over Indian Juveniles: The juvenile court did not have jurisdiction of charges of alleged acts of delinquency by enrolled Indians within the exterior boundaries of the reservation, although the tribal court had "remanded" the proceedings to juvenile court pursuant to a reservation code provision, where the State had not accepted jurisdiction through affirmative legislation and special tribal election. Blackwolf v. District Court, 158 M 523, 493 P2d 1293 (1972).

Involuntary Manslaughter: Conviction of involuntary manslaughter (now negligent homicide, 45-5-104), arising from driving an automobile while intoxicated, was proper notwithstanding defendant's contention that since he was a juvenile and "delinquent child" within the meaning of the juvenile code he could be punished only civilly for his acts and not criminally. St. v. Medicine Bull, 152 M 34, 445 P2d 916 (1968).

Right to Trial by Jury:

A child under the age of 16 years may never be tried for a law violation in the District Court. He is solely under the exclusive jurisdiction of the juvenile court. State ex rel. Dahl v. District Court, 134 M 395, 333 P2d 495 (1958). (Annotator's note: See sec. 3, Ch. 60, L. 1985, for crimes for which a child 12 years of age or more may be tried as an adult.)

Where a minor, charged with being a delinquent, made a demand for a jury trial on the day preceding the trial and at the opening of the trial, the court was without jurisdiction to try him without a jury. Application of Banschbach, 133 M 312, 323 P2d 1112 (1958).

Disqualification of Judge: Section 93-901, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed), which governs the removal of judges in civil actions and matters, applies to juvenile delinquency proceedings as the legislative intent as found in the juvenile statutes indicates that delinquency proceedings are to be treated as civil proceedings. State ex rel. Ostoj v. McClernan, 129 M 160, 284 P2d 252 (1955).

Criminal Liability: It is the child as defined in section 10-602, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed), to whom this part is primarily applicable and the one with whom the juvenile courts and authorities are ordinarily concerned. When such person arrives at the age of 18, he is an adult and under the criminal laws of this state is subject to the same rules of society as is any other adult no matter what his age may be. Exceptions found in this part are those regarding the person between 18 and 21 years of age, and such exceptions have to do with detention of such person and trial of such person if the offense for which he is charged occurred prior to the time he reached the age of 18. State ex rel. Bresnahan v. District Court, 127 M 310, 263 P2d 968 (1953). (See dissenting opinion in 127 M 310, 263 P2d 968 (1953).)

District Court Jurisdiction: Section 10-603, R.C.M. 1947 (since repealed), provided that the juvenile court shall have exclusive original jurisdiction in proceedings concerning any person under 21 years of age charged with having violated any law of the state, with specified exceptions. The District Court and not the juvenile court had jurisdiction over a defendant who was charged with attempted rape and who was under 21 but over 18 years of age at the time the alleged act was charged to have been committed. State ex rel. Bresnahan v. District Court, 127 M 310, 263 P2d 968 (1953).

Case Notes

No Authority of District Court to Impose Standard State Probation Conditions Upon Transfer of Jurisdiction From Youth Court to District Court: As a youth of 13, defendant committed sexual assault and was placed on probation with the condition that he complete an outpatient sexual offender treatment program. When the program had not been completed 2 years later, defendant's probation was revoked and he was placed at Pine Hills until age 18 and until completion of the Pine Hills sexual offender program, and if he failed to complete the program, he would be required to register as a sexual offender. When defendant turned 18, he was released from Pine Hills without completing the program. Defendant then stipulated to transfer supervisory control to District Court. The stipulation included a provision that defendant complete sexual offender treatment by age 25 and provided that defendant would have to register as a sexual offender if the treatment was not completed. Although the stipulation contained no other conditions or restrictions, defendant also signed a form that included the standard conditions of probation adopted by the Department of Corrections (DOC). Defendant subsequently violated some of the standard probation conditions, and the state petitioned to revoke probation. Defendant moved to dismiss the petition, but the District Court denied the motion and committed defendant to the DOC until age 25. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed. The stipulation placed only one condition on defendant, that being the requirement to complete sexual offender treatment by age 25. Defendant was not yet 25 years old, so that condition was not violated. The standard DOC probation conditions were imposed by the DOC, not by the court, and the DOC was not authorized to add conditions to those articulated by the court's judgment, nor did the court have authority to revoke defendant's probation for failure to abide by conditions added by the DOC after the sentence. Therefore, the District Court's judgment revoking defendant's probation and committing him to the DOC was reversible error. St. v. Andersen-Conway, 2007 MT 281, 339 M 439, 171 P3d 678 (2007).

No Authority of Youth Court to Order Youth to Pay Restitution Past Age of Majority: In 2000, a 12-year-old who admitted sexually assaulting an 8-year-old was adjudicated a delinquent youth by the Youth Court and placed on probation until age 18. Probation conditions included payment of restitution and the costs of the victim's therapy. In 2003, the Youth Court was notified by a restitution officer that a therapist had advised that counseling for the victim and the victim's mother was complete and that the restitution amount owed was $4,507.53; however, no restitution hearing was held. Nevertheless, the state and the youth's parents executed a restitution agreement specifying that the youth was liable for payment of restitution and identifying $4,507.53 as the total restitution due. The Youth Court signed the 2003 agreement, and $4,507.53 was subsequently paid in full. In 2005, the state requested a restitution hearing, noting that the victim's mother had submitted additional restitution claims of $4,352.93 for therapeutic sports activity for the victim and $8,309.25 for university schooling costs for the mother. At a hearing held 2 days before the end of the youth's probation, the Youth Court claimed jurisdiction over the youth for financial purposes until the youth turned 21 and ordered the youth to pay $12,662.18 in additional restitution to cover the mother's claims for sports and school-related costs. The youth appealed on grounds that the Youth Court had no authority to order additional restitution, and the Supreme Court reversed. The Youth Court limited its retention of jurisdiction beyond the youth's 18th birthday to enforcement of financial obligations set forth in the original disposition order and in the 2003 agreement establishing the total restitution to be paid by the youth. Therefore, the Youth Court did not have jurisdiction to impose additional restitution in a stand-alone order after the youth's probation, of which payment of restitution was a condition, expired, and the Supreme Court remanded with instructions to vacate the order for additional restitution. In re K.D.K., 2006 MT 187, 333 M 100, 141 P3d 1212 (2006).

Youth Court Jurisdiction Improperly Extended for Youth Charged With Crime Punishable by Life in Prison: In the case of a youth charged with felony sexual intercourse without consent, the Youth Court was without legal basis to extend its jurisdiction beyond the youth's 21st birthday because the youth was charged with a crime punishable by life imprisonment. In re N.V., 2004 MT 80, 320 M 442, 87 P3d 510 (2004).

Termination of Youth Court Jurisdiction — No Bar to Jurisdiction of District Court: The defendant was under 18 years of age when the crime of which he was accused was committed. 2011 Amendment: Chapter 87 in (6) in first sentence inserted "and any offense that arose during the commission of a crime enumerated in subsection (1)", and inserted second sentence regarding youth acquitted in district court. Amendment effective October 1, 2011.

Saving Clause: Section 2, Ch. 87, L. 2011, was a saving clause.

2007 Amendment: Chapter 483 inserted (1)(b)(iv) including the crime of sexual assault; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective May 11, 2007.

Severability: Section 29, Ch. 483, L. 2007, was a severability clause.

2005 Amendment: Chapter 277 in (1)(b)(x) inserted reference to 45-9-102(6); and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2005.

2001 Amendments — Composite Section: Chapter 7 renumbered former (1)(b)(xi) as new (1)(b)(xv); and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2001.

Chapter 243 inserted (1)(b)(x) relating to criminal possession of dangerous drugs; inserted (1)(b)(xi) relating to criminal possession with intent to distribute; in (1)(b)(xv) substituted "subsections (1)(b)(i) through (1)(b)(xii) and (1)(b)(xiv)" for "subsections (1)(b)(i) through (1)(b)(iii) and (1)(b)(v) through (1)(b)(xii)" (amendment modified by Ch. 7); and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2001.

Chapter 576 in (3) in last sentence near middle after "to the youth court" substituted "unless" for "if"; in (3)(a) near middle after "and disposition will" deleted "not"; inserted (3)(b) regarding nature of offense; in (3)(c) substituted "if the matter was prosecuted in youth court" for "and that, considering the seriousness of the offense, the case should remain in the district court"; in (7) substituted text regarding detention of youth in jail or other facility pending final disposition if physical separation is maintained for "(7) A youth whose case is filed in the district court may not be detained or otherwise placed in a jail or other adult detention facility before final disposition of the youth's case unless:

(a) alternative facilities do not provide adequate security; and

(b) the youth is kept in an area that provides physical separation as well as sight and sound separation from adults accused or convicted of criminal offenses"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 2001.

Style changes were slightly different in the chapters. In each case, the codifier chose appropriate text. The composite section includes all of the offenses enumerated in subsection (1)(b) to reflect the amendments by the chapters.

Severability: Section 5, Ch. 576, L. 2001, was a severability clause.

1999 Amendments — Composite Section: Chapter 432 in (1)(b)(iii) before "assault" deleted "or felony"; inserted (1)(b)(iv) concerning assault with a weapon; in (1)(b)(ix) substituted "criminal distribution" for "criminal sale"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 1999.

Chapter 523 in (1) in introductory clause near middle after "discretion" inserted "and in accordance with the procedure provided in 46-11-201"; in (3) substituted present language pertaining to hearings on and transfer of cases back to youth court for former language that read: "(3) The district court shall grant leave to file the information if the court finds that there is probable cause to believe that the youth has committed the alleged offense and that, considering the seriousness of the offense and in the interests of community protection, the case should be filed in the district court"; in (5)(b) inserted second sentence requiring a hearing before court decides the motion; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 1999.

Chapter 532 inserted (1)(a)(iv) concerning assault on a peace officer or judicial officer; inserted (1)(b)(xiii) concerning escape; in (6) at end of first sentence substituted "the court shall sentence the youth pursuant to 41-5-2503 and Titles 45 and 46. A youth who is sentenced to the department or a state prison must be evaluated and placed by the department in an appropriate juvenile or adult correctional facility" for "and is sentenced to the state prison, the commitment must be to the department of corrections"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 1999.

Chapter 537 at end of first sentence in (6) inserted "not to exceed the period of time allowed in 46-18-201"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 30, 1999. The code commissioner has not codified the change made to (6) by Ch. 537 because the change appears to have been rendered void by the changes to (6) made by Ch. 532.

1997 Amendments: Chapter 285 inserted (1)(b)(xi) authorizing the court to transfer to District Court a prosecution involving coercion or use of violence to coerce criminal street gang membership; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 16, 1997.

Chapter 550 in (1) substituted "The county attorney may, in the county attorney's discretion, file with the district court a motion for leave to file an information in the district court if" for "After a petition has been filed alleging delinquency, the court may, upon motion of the county attorney, before hearing the petition on its merits, transfer the matter of prosecution to the district court if"; in (1)(a) inserted "if it had been committed by an adult"; in (1)(a)(iv) inserted reference to accountability and after "mitigated deliberate homicide" deleted "if the act had been committed by an adult"; in (1)(b)(x) inserted reference to accountability and substituted "(1)(b)(i) through (1)(b)(x)" for "(1)(a)(ii)(A) through (1)(a)(ii)(I)"; deleted former (1)(b) through (4) that read: "(b) a hearing on whether the transfer should be made is held in conformity with the rules on a hearing on a petition alleging delinquency, except that the hearing must be conducted by the youth court without a jury;

(c) notice in writing of the time, place, and purpose of the hearing is given to the youth, the youth's counsel, and the youth's parents, guardian, or custodian at least 10 days before the hearing; and

(d) the court finds upon the hearing of all relevant evidence that there is probable cause to believe that:

(i) the youth committed the delinquent act alleged;

(ii) the seriousness of the offense and the protection of the community require treatment of the youth beyond that afforded by juvenile facilities; and

(iii) the alleged offense was committed in an aggressive, violent, or premeditated manner.

(2) In transferring the matter of prosecution to the district court, the court may also consider the following factors:

(a) the sophistication and maturity of the youth, determined by consideration of the youth's home, environmental situation, and emotional attitude and pattern of living;

(b) the record and previous history of the youth, including previous contacts with the youth court, law enforcement agencies, youth courts in other jurisdictions, prior periods of probation, and prior commitments to juvenile institutions. However, lack of a prior juvenile history with youth courts is not of itself grounds for denying the transfer.

(3) The court shall grant the motion to transfer if the youth was 16 years old or older at the time of the conduct alleged to be unlawful and the unlawful act would constitute deliberate homicide as defined in 45-5-102, mitigated deliberate homicide as defined in 45-5-103, or the attempt, as defined in 45-4-103, of either deliberate or mitigated deliberate homicide if the act had been committed by an adult.

(4) Upon transfer to district court, the judge shall make written findings of the reasons why the jurisdiction of the youth court was waived and the case transferred to district court"; inserted

(2) requiring filing in District Court if youth 17 years of age at time of offense; inserted (3) requiring court to grant leave to file if probable cause exists and considering seriousness of offense and interests of community protection; in (4), at beginning of first sentence, substituted "The filing of an information in district court terminates" for "The transfer terminates" and at end substituted "in the information" for "in the petition" and in second sentence substituted "has been filed in the district court" for "has been transferred"; deleted former (6) that read: "(6) Upon order of the youth court transferring the case to the district court under subsection (5), the county attorney shall file the information against the youth without unreasonable delay"; in (5)(b) substituted "order of the district court judge" for "order of the youth court judge"; in (6), in first sentence, substituted "offenses enumerated in subsection (1)" for "offenses transferred by the youth court", at end of third sentence substituted "a state prison facility" for "the state prison", and inserted fourth sentence requiring school-aged youth with disabilities to be provided an education while in confinement; in (7) substituted "whose case is filed in the district court" for "whose case is transferred to district court"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1997.

The amendments to this section made by sec. 3, Ch. 498, L. 1997, were rendered void by sec. 78(2), Ch. 550, L. 1997, a coordination section.

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 285, L. 1997, provided: "WHEREAS, the Legislature finds and declares that it is the right of every person to be secure and protected from fear, intimidation, and physical harm caused by the activities of violent groups and individuals; and

WHEREAS, it is not the intent of the Legislature to interfere with the exercise of the constitutionally protected rights of freedom of expression and association; and

WHEREAS, the Legislature hereby recognizes the constitutional right of every citizen to harbor and express beliefs on any lawful subject whatsoever, to lawfully associate with others who share similar beliefs, to petition lawfully constituted authority for a redress of perceived grievances, and to participate in the electoral process; and

WHEREAS, the Legislature further finds that the State of Montana is in a situation of rising crisis caused by the entry into the state of criminal street gangs whose members threaten, terrorize, and commit a multitude of crimes against the peaceful citizens of their neighborhoods; and

WHEREAS, these activities, both individually and collectively, present a clear and present danger to public order and safety and are not constitutionally protected; and

WHEREAS, the Legislature finds that several out-of-state criminal street gangs have established a presence in Montana's larger cities, that these criminal street gangs are attracting and recruiting members in Montana, and that identifiable criminal street gang-related crimes are beginning to appear and increase in Montana communities that have recognizable criminal street gang-related presences; and

WHEREAS, the Legislature finds that when these criminal street gangs establish a presence in Montana cities, the quality of Montana citizens' safety, welfare, and enjoyment of life begins to decline; and

WHEREAS, the Legislature wishes to deter the growing influx of violent criminal street gangs and criminal street gang-related activity in its communities and to protect Montana citizens from the terror associated with violent criminal street gangs; and

WHEREAS, it is the intent of the Legislature in enacting [sections 1 through 8] [45-8-401 through 45-8-408] to seek the eradication of activity of criminal street gangs by focusing on the patterns of criminal street gang activity and on the organized nature of criminal street gangs.

THEREFORE, the Legislature finds it appropriate to enact [sections 1 through 8] [45-8-401 through 45-8-408]."

Severability: Section 11, Ch. 285, L. 1997, was a severability clause.

Section 80, Ch. 550, L. 1997, was a severability clause.

Source: Chapter 285, L. 1997, was based on California Penal Code §§186.20 through 186.28, the "California Street Terrorism & Prevention Act".

Saving Clause: Section 79, Ch. 550, L. 1997, was a saving clause.

1995 Amendments: Chapter 438 inserted third sentence in (5) authorizing transfer of case to District Court after prosecution as provided in 41-5-208 or 41-5-1105 (renumbered 41-5-1605); in (6), after "court", inserted "under subsection (5)"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 14, 1995.

Chapter 546 in (8) substituted "department of corrections" for "department of corrections and human services"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1995.

Saving Clause: Section 571, Ch. 546, L. 1995, was a saving clause.

1993 Amendment: Chapter 448 inserted (1)(a)(ii)(I) allowing transfer to District Court of the prosecution of the offense of criminal production or manufacture of dangerous drugs; at end of (1)(a)(ii)(J) substituted "(1)(a)(ii)(I)" for (1)(a)(ii)(H); and made minor changes in style.

1991 Amendments — Instructions to Code Commissioner: The Code Commissioner changed "department of institutions" to "department of corrections and human services", pursuant to sec. 1, Ch. 262, L. 1991, directing the Code Commissioner to make the change wherever necessary in the Montana Code Annotated. Amendment effective July 1, 1991.

Chapter 547 in (9), after "detained", inserted "or otherwise placed in a jail or other" and at end deleted "the youth court judge determines that"; in (9)(a), at beginning, substituted "alternative facilities" for "the youth facilities"; in (9)(b) substituted present text concerning detaining youth in adult facility with physical, sight, and sound separation for "detention in the adult facility is in an area physically, aurally, and visually separate from that of adults"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1992.

1989 Amendment: Inserted (9) relating to detention of a youth in an adult detention facility.

1987 Amendments: Chapters 370, 515, and 609 deleted former (1)(a)(ii)(F) that read: "(F) sexual intercourse without consent as defined in 45-5-503"; and in (1)(a)(ii)(I) changed reference to (1)(a)(ii)(I) to reference to (1)(a)(ii)(H).

Chapter 515 in (1)(a)(ii)(C), after "aggravated", inserted "or felony"; in (1)(a)(ii)(H), after "drugs", deleted "for profit"; in (1)(d) substituted "is probable cause" for "are reasonable grounds"; deleted former (2)(c) and (2)(d) that read: "(c) the severity of the offense;

(d) the prospects for adequate protection of the public and the likelihood of reasonable rehabilitation of the youth by the use of procedures, services, and facilities currently available to the youth court"; inserted (3) describing when court must grant motion to transfer prosecution of youth to District Court; in (4), (5), and (6) changed "court" to "youth court"; in (7)(b) substituted "order of the youth court" for "acceptance by the district court"; and in (8), after "offenses", substituted "transferred by the youth court" for "enumerated in subsection (1) of this section".

Chapter 609 near end of (8), after "proper", inserted "including a state youth correctional facility under the procedures of 53-30-212 [renumbered 52-5-111]".

1985 Amendment: Inserted (1)(a)(i) allowing the transfer to District Court of a prosecution involving a youth 12 years of age or older who is charged with sexual intercourse without consent, deliberate homicide, mitigated deliberate homicide, attempted deliberate homicide, or attempted mitigated deliberate homicide; in (1)(a)(ii)(A) substituted "negligent homicide as defined in 45-5-104" for "criminal homicide as defined in 45-5-101"; and at end of (7) inserted "however, no youth under 16 years of age may be confined in the state prison".

1981 Amendment: Inserted subsections (1)(a)(x), allowing attempt of acts enumerated to be transferred to criminal court, (2)(c), allowing court to consider severity of offense in determining transfer, and (6), referring offenses not enumerated to youth or criminal court for trial; substituted "may" for "shall" after "court" in the introductory clause of (2); added the provision relating to prior juvenile history with youth courts to the end of (2)(b).

Case Notes

Untimely Youth Court Transfer Hearing — Failure to Move for Transfer to Youth Court Within Statutory Timeframe Not Ineffective Assistance of Counsel: Lindsey was charged with sexual intercourse without consent and sexual assault from incidents that occurred when he was 16 and 17 years old. A hearing to transfer the case to Youth Court was not held within 30 days, but Lindsey, who was 18 years old at the time he was charged, pleaded guilty to sexual assault in District Court and waived a Youth Court transfer. Prior to sentencing, Lindsey obtained new counsel and moved to withdraw his guilty plea. However, Lindsey waived his claim that he was denied due process by the lack of a timely transfer hearing. In addition, Lindsey did not receive ineffective assistance of counsel when his first counsel failed to move for dismissal of the charges on the ground that a timely transfer hearing was not held. Lindsey had time to prepare for the hearing, the District Court considered the transfer, and there was no evidence Lindsey was substantially prejudiced by the delay. St. v. Lindsey, 2011 MT 46, 359 Mont. 362, 249 P.3d 491.

Authority of District Court to Sentence Youth to Department of Corrections for Fifteen Years With None Suspended: After Quesnel violated five conditions of a suspended sentence for sexual intercourse without consent and sexual assault, Quesnel was sentenced to 15 years with the Department of Corrections with a recommendation for placement at the state prison and that parole eligibility be conditioned on completion of sexual offender treatment. Quesnel was a youth at the time of the offenses but was charged directly in District Court as an adult. Quesnel contended that the District Court lacked authority to impose a 15-year sentence because under the 2001 version of 46-18-201(3)(d)(i), all but the first 5 years of the sentence should be suspended. The state maintained that 46-18-201(3)(d)(ii) should apply because Quesnel was a youth whose case was transferred to District Court, so the District Court was authorized to impose the longer sentence. Quesnel argued that because charges were filed directly in District Court, his case was never technically transferred. The Supreme Court examined the legislative history to reconcile the use of the term "transferred" and concluded that 46-18-201(3)(d)(ii) applied not only to a youth whose case was transferred from Youth Court to District Court, but also to any youth who appears in District Court pursuant to 41-5-206. Quesnel appeared in District Court to answer charges of an offense enumerated in 41-5-206 and was found guilty, therefore the provisions of 46-18-201(3)(d)(ii) applied, and the District Court was not required to suspend all but 5 years of Quesnel's sentence but in fact was authorized to impose the 15-year sentence. The District Court was affirmed. St. v. Quesnel, 2009 MT 388, 353 M 317, 220 P3d 634 (2009).

Lack of Hearing to Determine Whether to Transfer Case to Youth Court — No Error: The state filed an information charging Quesnel with violations of a suspended sentence, but the District Court did not hold a hearing within 30 days to determine whether the case should be transferred back to Youth Court. Quesnel asserted that the court lacked authority to impose a sentence because Quesnel was improperly before the court absent the required hearing. The Supreme Court found the argument to be without merit. The reason the hearing was not held within 30 days was that both parties moved to continue the hearing multiple times. However, Quesnel at no time objected to the continuances and could not complain that the hearing was not timely. St. v. Quesnel, 2009 MT 388, 353 M 317, 220 P3d 634 (2009).

No Statutory Indication That Youth Received Illegal Sentence Following Transfer of Case to District Court: At the age of 17, Strong was charged with two counts of felony burglary, and the state moved to transfer the charges to District Court. The state also filed theft charges against Strong in Youth Court. Strong entered a guilty plea on the burglary charges in exchange for dismissal of the theft charges. The District Court sentenced Strong to the Department of Corrections for 8 years, with 2 years suspended on each count. While serving the prison term, Strong challenged the sentence as illegal because the District Court failed to suspend all but 5 years. The state countered that the 5-year limitation in 46-18-201(3)(d) did not apply to a youth who was transferred to District Court under 41-5-206. The District Court affirmed the original sentence and Strong appealed. Applying the criteria in St. v. Ellis, 2007 MT 210, 339 M 14, 167 P3d 896 (2007), the Supreme Court addressed the facial challenge to the exemption in 46-18-201(3)(d)(ii) and affirmed. In order for an adult to receive the less onerous commitment to the Department of Corrections, the sentencing court must be willing to suspend all but 5 years of the commitment, but the statute imposes no similar impediment on a court's ability to commit to the Department a youth transferred to District Court under 41-5-206. This enhanced flexibility with regard to the treatment of youth offenders comports with the goals of the Youth Court Act to ensure rehabilitation of youth offenders rather than solely retribution. Therefore, nothing in 46-18-201(3)(d)(ii) established that Strong received an illegal sentence. St. v. Strong, 2009 MT 65, 349 M 417, 203 P3d 848 (2009). See also In re C.H., 210 M 184, 683 P2d 931 (1984).

Revocation of Youth Court Probation and Imposition of Suspended Sentence Proper: When Hinkle was 17 years old, he pleaded true to the charge of negligent homicide. The case was tried in District Court, and Hinkle was committed to the Youth Court for suspended placement in a treatment facility until age 18, placed on formal juvenile probation until age 25, and given a stayed adult sentence of 20 years with the Department of Corrections, pursuant to 22 probation conditions, including requirements that Hinkle not violate the dispositional order, possess or consume alcohol, or commit a new offense. Twelve days after the sentencing hearing, Hinkle was cited for being a minor in possession of alcohol. The Youth Court revoked Hinkle's probation and transferred the case back to District Court for further proceedings. After considering numerous balancing factors, the District Court imposed the 20-year adult sentence that had been stayed, but suspended the sentence subject to 19 conditions, including prohibiting Hinkle from entering casinos and gambling. Hinkle appealed on grounds that his probation was improperly revoked, that the 20-year sentence was improperly imposed, and that the casino and gambling restriction was illegal. The Supreme Court affirmed on all issues. The District Court did not err in concluding that simply continuing Hinkle's youth probation for the probation violations would be no more than a slap on the wrist and would be inappropriate given the seriousness of the underlying homicide offense. Imposing a suspended adult sentence was in fact a further act of grace, in light of the fact that the court could have imposed a 20-year sentence of confinement, but Hinkle ignored the act of grace in asserting that the suspended sentence was unduly harsh. Additionally, Hinkle's personal characteristics made him particularly vulnerable to the pitfalls of irresponsible gambling, so the casino and gambling restriction was appropriate. Thus, the District Court's order was "neither arbitrary nor without conscientious judgment or exceeding the bounds of reason and was an appropriate exercise of discretion". St. v. Hinkle, 2008 MT 217, 344 M 236, 186 P3d 1279 (2008).

Youth Tried, Convicted, and Sentenced Under Transfer Statute Correctly Sentenced as Persistent Felony Offender: In 1999, when Mainwaring was a juvenile, he pleaded guilty to mitigated deliberate homicide and was convicted pursuant to this section and sentenced pursuant to 41-5-2503(1)(a). A part of that sentence was later suspended under 41-5-2510. Later, shortly after turning 21, Mainwaring assaulted a child. The state brought assault charges against Mainwaring and then sought to have the court designate Mainwaring as a persistent felony offender (PFO). The District Court approved the designation as a PFO, based on Mainwaring's 1999 felony conviction, and Mainwaring was convicted and sentenced to 20 years in prison. The Supreme Court held that a conviction under subsection (6) of this section was equivalent to any adult felony conviction and that there is nothing in the Montana Youth Court Act or the Criminally Convicted Youth Act that precludes the application of the PFO statutes and designation to an individual previously convicted of a felony when the individual was a youth. Citing St. v. Damon, 2005 MT 218, 328 M 276, 119 P3d 1194 (2005), the Supreme Court held that the District Court therefore had the authority to apply the PFO statutes and designation to Mainwaring. The Supreme Court also overruled Mainwaring's due process objections and affirmed his conviction. St. v. Mainwaring, 2007 MT 14, 335 M 322, 151 P3d 53 (2007).

Due Process Satisfied by Requiring Hearing After Information Filed — Butler Overruled: In St. v. Butler, 1999 MT 70, 294 M 17, 977 P2d 1000 (1999), the Supreme Court held that to satisfy due process, a youth must be afforded a hearing prior to the filing of an information in District Court to charge the youth as an adult. Subsequent amendment to this section established a transfer hearing requirement within 30 days after leave to file an information is granted. The amendment was held to satisfy due process, so to the extent that Butler required a hearing before filing in District Court, Butler was overruled. St. v. McKee, 2006 MT 5, 330 M 249, 127 P3d 445 (2006).

Claim of Illegal Sentence Based on Lack of Jurisdiction to Be Raised on Direct Appeal, Not Postconviction Petition — Pena Applied: Camarillo was a minor when he was convicted in 1999 of deliberate homicide, robbery, and aggravated burglary and sentenced as an adult offender to 70 years in the state prison. The case was filed directly in District Court rather than Youth Court, as allowed under this section. Camarillo filed a petition for postconviction relief in 2003, claiming that the District Court lacked subject matter jurisdiction. The state responded that the claims could have been raised on direct appeal, and the District Court agreed and dismissed the petition. On appeal, the Supreme Court noted that the District Court properly exercised jurisdiction under Art. VII, sec. 4, Mont. Const., so Camarillo's jurisdiction argument failed. The court then applied Pena v. St., 2004 MT 293, 323 M 347, 100 P3d 154 (2004), and held that the issues that Camarillo attempted to raise in the petition for postconviction relief could have been but were not raised on direct appeal and, pursuant to 46-21-105, could not be brought in the petition for postconviction relief. In addition, under 46-21-102, petitions for postconviction relief must be filed within 1 year of final judgment. Camarillo's petition was not filed until more than 3 years after judgment and thus was untimely. The District Court was affirmed. Camarillo v. St., 2005 MT 29, 326 M 35, 107 P3d 1265 (2005).

Proper Consideration of Conflicting Evidence in Assigning Youth Deliberate Homicide Case to District Court: The District Court determined that it, rather than Youth Court, was the proper venue for prosecution of a deliberate homicide case against Whiteman, a juvenile. Whiteman appealed on grounds that the District Court contemplated only selective factual allegations proposed by the state and adopted verbatim. The Supreme Court disagreed. The District Court made comprehensive findings of fact that intimately detailed testimony offered at trial and were not subject to being overturned simply because the District Court relied on proposed findings and conclusions submitted by counsel. Whiteman's contention that the District Court erred in determining that the nature of the offense warranted prosecution in District Court also failed. Substantial credible evidence, even though conflicting, supported findings that probable cause existed for a deliberate homicide charge and prosecution in District Court. Despite testimony from three of Whiteman's teachers and a psychologist that Whiteman was intelligent, respectful, and just needed more structure, the District Court did not err in finding that a Youth Court proceeding and disposition would not serve the interests of the community or promote Whiteman's rehabilitation. Prosecution of the deliberate homicide in District Court was affirmed. St. v. Whiteman, 2005 MT 15, 325 M 358, 106 P3d 543 (2005). See also St. v. Smith, 261 M 419, 863 P2d 1000 (1993), and St. v. Spina, 1999 MT 113, 294 M 367, 982 P2d 421 (1999).

Right to Appeal Error in Length of Sentence Lost by Failing to File Petition Within Statutory Time Limit: Pena, who was 17 years of age at the time, was sentenced as an adult to 45 years in prison for deliberate homicide and aggravated burglary. Pena did not challenge the legality of his sentence on direct appeal, but more than a year after entering a guilty plea and being sentenced, Pena filed a petition alleging that his sentence was illegal because the Montana Youth Court Act provided that a youth could not be sentenced to the custody of the Department of Corrections for more than 5 years and therefore the District Court did not have subject matter jurisdiction to impose a longer sentence. Pena argued that the lack of subject matter jurisdiction was not subject to any statutory postconviction time limits for filing appeals and could be raised at any time. The Supreme Court held that an error in sentencing does not divest a court of subject matter jurisdiction over the case before it. The Supreme Court further held that all postconviction claims, both jurisdictional and nonjurisdictional, must be brought within the 1-year time limit provided by statute and that the time limit was jurisdictional and was not waived by the state's failure to raise the issue in District Court. Pena v. St., 2004 MT 293, 323 M 347, 100 P3d 154 (2004), overruled in Davis v. St., 2008 MT 226, 344 M 300, 187 P3d 654 (2008), to the extent that Pena held that the Legislature limited District Courts' subject matter jurisdiction by codifying a 1-year time bar on postconviction relief pursuant to 46-21-102.

Statute Allowing Transfer of Jurisdiction of Juvenile to District Court Not Violative of Constitutional Separation of Powers Doctrine: Bedwell was 17 when he was charged with burglary, theft, and misdemeanor criminal mischief. The motion to charge him as an adult under this section was granted. Bedwell moved to dismiss on grounds that this section unconstitutionally violated the separation of powers doctrine, impermissibly vesting the court with prosecutorial powers to determine the manner in which to enforce laws with respect to specified juvenile offenders, by allowing the courts discretion to decide whether a juvenile should be treated as an adult. The District Court agreed, finding that courts were allowed to indirectly determine what charges should be filed against a juvenile by determining the legal forum in which a juvenile proceeding should be prosecuted, and remanded for filing in Youth Court. The state appealed. The Supreme Court reversed. In determining whether to accept jurisdiction, a District Court is not making a prosecutorial decision on how the law should be enforced or deciding whether a prosecution should go forward or what charges should be brought. The statute merely allows District Courts a proper judicial function to exercise discretion in determining whether to accept or reject jurisdiction over juvenile offenders under specified circumstances, which does not usurp or intrude into prosecutorial duties and powers of the County Attorney or intrude a court into Executive Branch powers. Thus, this section is not violative of the separation of powers doctrine. St. v. Bedwell, 1999 MT 206, 295 M 476, 985 P2d 150, 56 St. Rep. 805 (1999).

Findings and Conclusions in Transfer Order Not in Error — Transfer Affirmed: Spina was charged with killing her father. She raised numerous arguments that certain issues were not properly considered and that the findings of fact and conclusions of law in a Youth Court transfer order were erroneous and a simple verbatim adoption of the state's proposed findings. The Supreme Court considered each argument in turn and concluded that there was probable cause to believe that Spina committed the delinquent act alleged, that the seriousness of the offense and the protection of the community required treatment of Spina beyond that afforded by juvenile facilities, and that the alleged offense was committed in an aggressive, violent, or premeditated manner. The Youth Court's failure to specifically set forth findings regarding Spina's level of maturity was not reversible error, nor was it in error in finding that Spina was in need of long-term secure care beyond age 19. The Youth Court did not abuse its discretion in transferring Spina's case to District Court. St. v. Spina, 1999 MT 113, 294 M 367, 982 P2d 421, 56 St. Rep. 467 (1999).

No Error in Youth Court Conclusion That Incarceration Not Mandatory if Youth Convicted in District Court: In its transfer order, the Youth Court concluded that transferring Spina into the adult system neither mandated incarceration nor precluded rehabilitation and that although any commitment of the youth must necessarily be to the Department of Corrections, the Department was not necessarily bound to incarcerate Spina. The Supreme Court agreed. The sentencing guidelines in 46-18-201 provide a District Court with a number of sentencing options, including imposition of a deferred or suspended sentence. The Youth Court was correct in concluding that Spina's conviction would not mandate incarceration. St. v. Spina, 1999 MT 113, 294 M 367, 982 P2d 421, 56 St. Rep. 467 (1999).

Transfer of Youth Court Case to District Court Not Violative of Equal Protection Rights: Spina argued that the statute allowing transfer of her Youth Court case to the District Court resulted in an equal protection violation because of discriminatory treatment on the basis of her gender, asserting that the transfer was primarily motivated by the lack of affordable placement options for girls in the juvenile system. However, the primary concern in Spina's case was not that placements were not available, but that the duration of placement in the juvenile system would not be long enough to rehabilitate her. Further, the quality of supervision required for a juvenile like Spina, who was charged with killing her father, was not available for male or female offenders, so the concern was not triggered by gender. State placement policy with regard to juvenile offenders convicted and sentenced as adults has no bearing on the constitutionality of the transfer statute. Hence, it is not the transfer statute that generates any alleged disparities in treatment but rather the state placement policies, and the policies were not at issue in this case. Spina's challenge of the transfer statute on equal protection grounds failed. St. v. Spina, 1999 MT 113, 294 M 367, 982 P2d 421, 56 St. Rep. 467 (1999).

Transfer of Youth Court Case to District Court Not Violative of Minor's Constitutional Rights: Spina argued that the statute allowing transfer of her Youth Court case to the District Court resulted in violation of her rights under Art. II, sec. 15, Mont. Const., which guarantees to minors the same fundamental rights afforded to adults, and under Art. II, sec. 24, Mont. Const., which guarantees the right to a fair trial. The Supreme Court considered alleged violations of the right against self-incrimination, the right to effective assistance of counsel, the right to a fair trial, and the right to a presumption of innocence, finding that Spina's arguments were without merit. The transfer statute did not violate Spina's constitutional rights. St. v. Spina, 1999 MT 113, 294 M 367, 982 P2d 421, 56 St. Rep. 467 (1999).

Direct Filing of Information in District Court Rather Than Filing in Youth Court Violative of Due Process — Probable Cause Hearing Required: Pursuant to this section, Butler, a youth, was charged in District Court with attempted deliberate homicide and attempted robbery. Butler moved to have the District Court declare this section unconstitutional on grounds that it violated his right to due process by allowing the prosecution to file an information directly in District Court rather than Youth Court without first affording him a hearing. The motion was denied, and Butler appealed. Although it is within the province of the prosecution to move the District Court for leave to file an information in that court if the youth has attained a certain age and is alleged to have committed certain unlawful conduct, the prosecution's discretion ends at that point. Absent a pure prosecutorial waiver system, the ultimate decision rests with the District Court, which must make specific findings that there is probable cause to believe the youth committed the offense and that, because of the seriousness of the offense, the case should be filed in District Court. In Butler's case, the District Court based its decision solely on the affidavit of the prosecution and Butler did not have the opportunity, with assistance of counsel, to challenge the specific findings of the court. Although declining to declare the entire statute unconstitutional, the Supreme Court cited Kent v. U.S., 383 US 541, 16 L Ed 2d 84, 86 S Ct 1045 (1966), in holding that because the decision in this regard is potentially critically important to the youth, under the 14th amendment to the United States Constitution, Butler's right to due process requires that the District Court hold a hearing when rendering a decision under subsection (3) of this section. St. v. Butler, 1999 MT 70, 294 M 17, 977 P2d 1000, 56 St. Rep. 291 (1999), followed and applied retroactively in St. v. O'Neill, 1999 MT 224, 296 M 71, 985 P2d 154, 56 St. Rep. 886 (1999). Butler was overruled, to the extent that it requires a hearing before filing in District Court, in St. v. McKee, 2006 MT 5, 330 M 249, 127 P3d 445 (2006).

Indian Defendant — Failure to Challenge Transfer to District Court and Failure to Reserve Right to Appeal Issues — District Court Jurisdiction Upheld: After the state filed an amended petition in Youth Court to have Spotted Blanket declared a delinquent youth and a serious juvenile offender, the state and Spotted Blanket stipulated to transferring the case to District Court. Later, Spotted Blanket objected to the jurisdiction of the District Court, arguing that the Youth Court abused its discretion in making the transfer because there was insufficient evidence that the juvenile facilities were inadequate, as required by subsection (1)(d)(ii) of this section (see 1997 amendment), and because the District Court failed to make a finding of probable cause concerning some of the counts against him, as required by the same statute. The Supreme Court declined to address those issues, noting that: (1) Spotted Blanket's notice of appeal was limited to the District Court order denying his motion to dismiss and did not include the order transferring the case to District Court; (2) Spotted Blanket never challenged the propriety of the transfer to District Court and, citing the requirements of 46-12-204, St. v. Weeks, 270 M 63, 891 P2d 477 (1995), and St. v. Swoboda, 276 M 479, 918 P2d 296 (1996), holding that claims of error not properly preserved in the trial court are barred from appellate review; (3) Spotted Blanket stipulated to the transfer and that a probable cause hearing would not be necessary; and (4) Spotted Blanket pleaded guilty to the felony counts and noting that the plea acts as a waiver of nonjurisdictional defects under the Supreme Court's prior opinions in St. v. Butler, 272 M 286, 900 P2d 908 (1995), and Stilson v. St., 278 M 20, 924 P2d 238 (1996). St. v. Spotted Blanket, 1998 MT 59, 288 M 126, 955 P2d 1347, 55 St. Rep. 253 (1998).

Lack of Testimony Regarding Inadequacy of Juvenile Facilities — Transfer to District Court Inappropriate: A Youth Court order transferring charges of attempted deliberate homicide, attempted robbery, and felony theft to the District Court was an abuse of discretion absent testimony that juvenile facilities were inadequate to deal with the youth and in light of a lack of substantial credible evidence supporting the findings of the Youth Court. An assumption that juvenile facilities are inadequate based on the mere fact that a youth is charged with a serious offense ignores the rehabilitative purpose of the Montana Youth Court Act. In re J.K.C., 270 M 342, 891 P2d 1169, 52 St. Rep. 221 (1995), distinguishing In re K.M.H., 231 M 180, 752 P2d 162 (1988), In re T.N., 267 M 81, 881 P2d 1329, 51 St. Rep. 955 (1994), and In re J.D.W., 267 M 87, 881 P2d 1324, 51 St. Rep. 958 (1994).

Error to Assume Juvenile Facilities Inadequate Based Upon Seriousness of Youth's Crimes: The Youth Court took judicial notice of the length of time that a Youth Court may commit a juvenile and ordered J.D.W.'s case transferred to District Court. The Supreme Court held that there was no testimony given by Pine Hills staff or anyone else that the average length of stay in a juvenile facility would be inadequate for rehabilitation in J.D.W.'s case and that therefore it was error for the Youth Court to assume that a juvenile facility was inadequate based solely on the seriousness of the juvenile's crimes. In re J.D.W., 267 M 87, 881 P2d 1324, 51 St. Rep. 958 (1994).

Transfer Proper When Youth Poses Threat to Community and Juvenile Facilities Inadequate: T.N. was accused of shooting his father. The District Court decided to transfer the case to adult court on the basis that a Youth Court could not order his commitment to a treatment facility for a period as long as might be needed and on the basis that the juvenile facilities were not equipped to provide the type of treatment that T.N. might need. T.N. argued that the District Court erred in transferring him because he did not pose a threat to the community. The Supreme Court held that there was no error because the record did include medical testimony that although it was unlikely that there would be another violent occurrence, it could not be ruled out and because the record supported the finding that the juvenile facilities were inadequate for the potential needs of T.N.'s rehabilitation. In re T.N., 267 M 81, 881 P2d 1329, 51 St. Rep. 955 (1994).

Decision to Transfer Within Discretion of Youth Court: The decision whether to transfer a case from Youth Court to District Court, after the statutory criteria have been considered, is within the discretion of the Youth Court. In re J.A., 255 M 214, 841 P2d 1130, 49 St. Rep. 972 (1992), followed in In re T.N., 267 M 81, 881 P2d 1329, 51 St. Rep. 955 (1994), and in In re J.D.W., 267 M 87, 881 P2d 1324, 51 St. Rep. 958 (1994). In re T.N. was followed in St. v. Spina, 1999 MT 113, 294 M 367, 982 P2d 421, 56 St. Rep. 467 (1999).

Finding of Aggressive Behavior Sufficient to Warrant Transfer to District Court: Evidence of aggressive behavior by a youth that led to the shooting of another youth constituted sufficient probable cause under the statutory criteria of this section to warrant transfer of the case to District Court. In re J.A., 255 M 214, 841 P2d 1130, 49 St. Rep. 972 (1992).

Arrest for Felony Assault (now Assault With a Weapon) and Robbery — Transfer to District Court Proper: The jurisdiction over a 17 year old was properly transferred to District Court after the Youth Court considered testimony and evidence relating to the youth's arrest for felony assault (now assault with a weapon) and robbery, prior criminal record, negative psychological evaluation, and sophistication and maturity; the seriousness of the offenses; the protection of society; and the inappropriateness of treatment in the juvenile program. In re B.J., 239 M 371, 780 P2d 1132, 46 St. Rep. 1756 (1989).

Mandatory Transfer of Prosecution of Older Youth to District Court — No Denial of Equal Protection Under U.S. or Montana Constitution: Plaintiff alleged that the automatic transfer provisions of subsection (3) of this section infringed upon a youth's rights to equal protection under the equal protection provisions of the U.S. Constitution and the Montana Constitution. The Supreme Court held that a classification based on age and gravity of the offense for automatic transfer of prosecution to District Court from Youth Court requires only a rational relationship to a legitimate state interest. The court found that interest in curbing homicides committed by teenagers and in protecting society from these violent offenders. Strict scrutiny analysis under federal equal protection is not required because procedural due process is not a fundamental right, nor is age a suspect class. Under Art. II, sec. 4, Mont. Const., the Supreme Court determined that no provision exists in the Montana Constitution that provides a youth with a fundamental right to special treatment, and thus the state's middle tier analysis is inapplicable and only a rational relationship to a legitimate state interest is required. In re Wood, 236 M 118, 768 P2d 1370, 46 St. Rep. 228 (1989).

Mandatory Transfer of Prosecution of Older Youth to District Court — Not Violation of Doctrine of Separation of Powers: The automatic transfer provisions of subsection (3) of this section, providing for the prosecution of older youth for certain offenses in District Court rather than Youth Court, are not a usurpation of the judiciary's power to hear and decide motions and is not in violation of the Montana Constitution's requirement for separation of powers. The transfer provision is within the Legislature's inherent power to create other courts under Art. VII, sec. 1, Mont. Const. The 1987 amendment providing for transfer without hearing on mitigating factors was merely a revision of protection afforded youth under earlier legislative action and not a violation of the separation of powers doctrine. In re Wood, 236 M 118, 768 P2d 1370, 46 St. Rep. 228 (1989).

Transfer of Youth to District Court for Homicide Prosecution — Age of Youth Determines Whether Hearing Necessary: For a youth between 12 years and 16 years of age charged with homicide, a hearing may be held to determine whether prosecution should be transferred to District Court. For youth 16 years old or older, no hearing is authorized, and the youth must be transferred to District Court upon a motion by the County Attorney. In re Wood, 236 M 118, 768 P2d 1370, 46 St. Rep. 228 (1989).

Youth Sixteen Years Old and Older — Mandatory Transfer of Homicide Prosecution to District Court — No Denial of Due Process: A youth does not have a constitutional due process right to a hearing to determine whether a homicide prosecution should be transferred to District Court. However, whatever criteria is set in state law for the transfer must be followed. The Supreme Court held that in a homicide prosecution, the requirement for a transfer hearing for youth between 12 years and 16 years of age and for a mandatory transfer for youth 16 years old or older is permissible. Since no irregularities in the transfer of an older youth for homicide prosecution in District Court were alleged, there was no violation of his federal due process rights. In re Wood, 236 M 118, 768 P2d 1370, 46 St. Rep. 228 (1989).

Transfer of Fifteen Year Old to District Court on Homicide Charge: Substantial credible evidence supported a Youth Court finding that a 15-year-old minor be transferred to District Court in light of the seriousness of the offense and the need to protect the community. In re K.M.H., 231 M 180, 752 P2d 162, 45 St. Rep. 526 (1988).

Termination of Youth Court Jurisdiction — No Bar to Jurisdiction of District Court: The defendant was under 18 years of age when the crime of which he was accused was committed. When the defendant was 20 years old he confessed, and the County Attorney filed a petition in the Youth Court, seeking a declaration that the defendant was a delinquent youth and requesting authority to incarcerate him. The defendant turned 21 before the motion was ruled on. He then was charged with deliberate homicide in District Court. The defendant contended that when the Youth Court lost jurisdiction over him under 41-5-205, the District Court did not have jurisdiction because once jurisdiction has attached under 41-5-203, the District Court can never assume jurisdiction over the offense underlying the Youth Court's proceeding absent transfer under 41-5-206, which did not occur here. The Supreme Court held that on termination of Youth Court jurisdiction, there was no bar to the exercise of jurisdiction by the District Court under Art. VII, sec. 4(1), Mont. Const., 3-5-302, and 46-2-201, over felony proceedings against the defendant. Exclusive original jurisdiction of the Youth Court does not divest a District Court of jurisdiction over crimes committed by a juvenile defendant. St. v. Beach, 217 M 132, 705 P2d 94, 42 St. Rep. 1080 (1985).

Prosecution of Felonies in Youth Court Proper: In cases pending in the Youth Court, two youths, ages 14 and 15, were charged with numerous felony counts. The State sought to arrest the proceeding in the Youth Court to move that the youths be transferred to the jurisdiction of the District Court under this statute. The State contends that the requirement for transfer (that a youth charged with a felony must have been 16 years of age or older at the time of the alleged unlawful conduct before the charges may be transferred to District Court) effectively gives the Youth Court all jurisdiction over all felony criminal cases if the youth charged is less than 16 years old and that this provision conflicts with Art. VII, sec. 4(1), Mont. Const., which provides for District Court jurisdiction. The State further contends that this constitutional provision gives the District Court exclusive jurisdiction in all criminal cases amounting to a felony and that a youth under 16 years is legally capable of committing a felony. In denying the state's application, the Supreme Court held that: (1) the term "original jurisdiction", as used in that section of the constitution, does not mean exclusive jurisdiction; and (2) felonies may be prosecuted in the Youth Court because when it acts in jurisdiction it is acting as a District Court. In re T.L.G. & M.E.H., 214 M 164, 692 P2d 1227, 41 St. Rep. 2388 (1984).

Accountability: The youth was charged with criminal homicide under the accountability statute. The Supreme Court rejected the youth's argument that the Youth Court could not transfer the case to the adult court because he was not charged under the criminal homicide statute, 45-5-101 (now repealed). The Supreme Court stated that there is no separate offense of accountability, only the underlying offense which has been physically committed by another but for which the youth is equally responsible. (The case was reversed on other grounds.) In re B.D.C., 211 M 216, 687 P2d 655, 41 St. Rep. 1318 (1984).

Finding Not Supported by Evidence: A petition was filed alleging a youth to be a delinquent youth, based on an allegation that the youth was guilty of criminal homicide. The Youth Court ordered a 45-day evaluation at Pine Hills, which reported to the Youth Court that Pine Hills School (now Pine Hills Youth Correctional Facility) was an appropriate placement for the youth and that the staff could help him in dealing with the problems he was having. The Youth Court later sought to transfer the case to the District Court and in its findings found that the juvenile facilities were inadequate for the youth in light of the seriousness of the offense and the need to protect the community. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that there was no evidence to support the Youth Court's adequacy of placement finding and therefore the Youth Court had no jurisdiction to transfer the case to District Court. In re B.D.C., 211 M 216, 687 P2d 655, 41 St. Rep. 1318 (1984).

Youth Legally Capable of Committing Crime — Jurisdiction When Crime Disclosed After Majority: The District Court has jurisdiction to try an individual charged at age 22 for felonies allegedly committed at age 15, as provided in the court's constitutional grant of jurisdiction over all felonies. The Youth Court Act does not contain any direct statement or implication that the Legislature intended to set the minimum age of criminal responsibility at 16, making a 15-year-old incapable of committing a crime. The primary purposes of statutes defining a "delinquent youth" and providing for transfer to District Court are to clarify that delinquency proceedings are noncriminal and to prohibit prosecution of youths in District Court while they are youths. State ex rel. Elliot v. District Court, 211 M 1, 684 P2d 481, 41 St. Rep. 1184 (1984).

Illegal Pretrial Process and Procedure — State's Right to Charge and Try Case: Youth Court petition initiating proceedings did not state the facts constituting the offense youth was charged with in ordinary and concise language so as to enable a person of common understanding to know what was intended. The petition did not include a witness list. An arrest warrant was issued out of the Youth Court, although there is no provision in the Youth Court Act for issuance of an arrest warrant. Presumably the warrant was issued under 46-6-201, but there was no showing of probable cause supported by oath or affirmation reduced to writing. The youth had already been arrested in Oklahoma at the time the warrant was issued. By what process and authority he was arrested in Oklahoma was not shown, nor was it shown he was arrested by a law enforcement officer. He was subsequently transferred to the District Court for trial as an adult and convicted of two counts of deliberate homicide. The Youth Court proceedings from issuance of the warrant for arrest onward were patently defective. However, this did not preclude the state from having him transferred to the District Court, proceeding against him, and obtaining a conviction. St. v. Woods, 203 M 401, 662 P2d 579, 40 St. Rep. 533 (1983).

Transfer From Youth Court to District Court — Youth Court Hearing — Valid Initiation of District Court Action: At Youth Court hearing at which it was decided to transfer youth to District Court for trial as an adult, testimony established probable cause for filing of an information in the District Court. This procedure satisfied the state constitutional requirement that a criminal action in the District Court be initiated either by an information after examination and commitment by a magistrate or after leave granted by the District Court. St. v. Woods, 203 M 401, 662 P2d 579, 40 St. Rep. 533 (1983).

Transfer to District Court — Hearing on Youth Court Petition Against Youth Unnecessary: The provision in 41-5-516 (now repealed) that a petition alleging delinquency or need of supervision (now intervention) shall be dismissed with prejudice if a hearing on the petition is not begun within 15 days after service does not apply when the charges are subject to transfer to the District Court and a timely motion to transfer is made. St. v. Woods, 203 M 401, 662 P2d 579, 40 St. Rep. 533 (1983).

Substantial Credible Evidence to Support Youth Court's Determination: N.C.F., a minor, is accused of shooting a 16-year-old girl in the face with a sawed-off shotgun and killing her. The State filed a motion requesting the Youth Court to waive its jurisdiction and to transfer jurisdiction to the District Court. At a hearing on the State's motion, evidence was offered that N.C.F. occasionally dry-fired a gun while it was pointed at an individual. Testimony was also offered that there was no Youth Court facility available for treatment of N.C.F., because of his size, age, independent lifestyle, and level of maturity. Based on the evidence, the Youth Court issued an order granting the State's motion. N.C.F. appealed the order. The Supreme Court found that there was substantial credible evidence to support the Youth Court's determination. In re N.C.F., 197 M 390, 643 P2d 236, 39 St. Rep. 634 (1982).

Youth Court — Holding Youth Without Arraignment Until Transfer to District Court: Defendant, age 17, was arrested and charged with homicide. Defendant refused to be interviewed by a Youth Court probation officer or a psychologist. The State moved to transfer prosecution to the District Court. Because of lack of an interview, the probation officer could not recommend for or against transfer and so advised the court. The motion was granted and defendant was ordered to be tried as an adult. Defendant contends that the cause of the transfer was his refusal to be interviewed and that the court placed on him the burden to justify continuation in Youth Court. Placing the burden on him, defendant claims, would force him to waive his right against self-incrimination. That is not the case here; the record indicates that the Youth Court considered each factor in 41-5-206. Once the Youth Court was refused the interviews, the only source of information it could rely on was that coming other than from the defendant. In doing so the Youth Court considered each of the factors set out in 41-5-206. St. v. Rodriguez, 192 M 411, 628 P2d 280, 38 St. Rep. 578F (1981).

Insanity Defense — Discretion of Judge — Attempt: A transfer hearing is not an adjudicatory stage of the juvenile process. Appellant's constitutional right to assert the insanity defense was not denied when judge failed to allow entry of the plea at the transfer hearing. The Youth Court did not abuse its discretion in transferring the matter. Lastly, the court erred in transferring charge of attempted homicide because that charge is not specifically enumerated. In re Stapelkempr, 172 M 192, 562 P2d 825 (1977).

Factors Court Must Consider — Evidence to Be Preserved For Appeal: When juvenile was arrested and charged with attempted robbery, robbery, and aggravated assault, and State attempted to waive him to adult criminal court, evidence presented at transfer hearing was insufficient to waive jurisdiction because State failed to present evidence concerning requirements in this section and cause was remanded to Youth Court. The importance of a transfer hearing demands that the Youth Court carefully consider all factors set forth in this section, and evidence relevant to each factor should be preserved in the transcript in order to permit meaningful appellate review. In re Stevenson, 167 M 220, 538 P2d 5 (1975).

Constitutional Requirements: Conventional findings of fact or an express, formal statement of the reasons for ordering the waiver and transfer to the District Court are not required; if the reasons motivating the exercise of the juvenile court's discretion in ordering the waiver and transfer are sufficiently apparent in the record to allow meaningful appellate review, constitutional requirements are satisfied. Transfer of defendant to District Court on charge of second degree assault under former law was not an abuse of discretion when at the time of the commission of the crime the defendant was a juvenile by less than 1 month, the victim was brutally assaulted without provocation, the defendant was far removed from influences of family, home, or normal adult supervision, and trial court found that the probable cause was of such a nature that failure to bring the defendant to trial on the charge of second degree assault would have failed to preserve the best and necessary interest of the people of the State of Montana. Lujan v. District Court, 161 M 287, 505 P2d 896 (1973).

Criminal Information: District Court has no jurisdiction to authorize or order the filing of a criminal information against a juvenile child of less than 16 years of age or to try such child in the District Court. State ex rel. Dahl v. District Court, 134 M 395, 333 P2d 495 (1958). (Annotator's note: Chapter 60, sec. 3, L. 1985, amended 41-5-206 to permit the transfer to District Court of criminal proceedings against youths 12 years of age or older who are charged with one of several serious crimes listed in the statute.)

Attorney General's Opinions

Exemption of Juvenile Delinquents From Sexual Offender Registration: A juvenile who is adjudicated delinquent under the Montana Youth Court Act and whose case has not been transferred to District Court under this section is exempt from the registration requirements of the Sexual Offender Registration Act, 46-18-254 (now repealed); 46-18-255; and Title 46, ch. 23, part 5. 43 A.G. Op. 45 (1989).

41-5-208. Transfer of supervisory responsibility to district court after juvenile disposition — nonextended jurisdiction and nontransferred cases.

Compiler's Comments

1999 Amendment: Chapter 537 in middle of first sentence in (1) substituted "part 16" for "part 11". Amendment effective April 30, 1999.

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 537, L. 1999, provided: "WHEREAS, juveniles who are 17 to 18 years of age frequently have difficulty completing their Youth Court sentences, particularly felony offenses, before they reach age 18; and

WHEREAS, extending juvenile jurisdiction with the possibility of an adult sanction for failure to comply with the conditions of a stayed sentence or for additional criminal behavior by the youth has been shown to be an effective incentive in other states to rehabilitate juveniles to keep them out of the adult correctional system and allow them to pay restitution, finish treatment, and complete their education; and

WHEREAS, the maximum extension or period of jurisdiction may not exceed the period of an adult sentence without violating equal protection; and

WHEREAS, limiting section 41-5-208, MCA, supervision transfers after the youth reaches the age of 18 to additional community corrections programs of the Department of Corrections subject to the same adult sentence limit on supervision will also allow juveniles to complete their sentences, to be held accountable, and to avoid an adult conviction, without violating equal protection of the laws."

Severability: Section 7, Ch. 537, L. 1999, was a severability clause.

1997 Amendments: Chapter 286 in (1) and (2) substituted "under 41-5-1513" for "under 41-5-523" ((2) amendment voided by Ch. 498).

Chapter 498 in (1) inserted first sentence allowing transfer of jurisdiction to District Court and transfer of supervisory responsibility for cases that were not originally transferred under 41-5-206 or prosecuted as extended jurisdiction juvenile cases and at beginning of second sentence inserted "A transfer under this section may be made to" and at end, after "21 years of age", deleted "the youth court judge may transfer jurisdiction to district court and order the transfer of supervisory responsibility and the youth's case files to the department"; inserted (2) requiring hearing and establishing procedure for hearing; inserted (3) allowing court to order transfer to District Court after hearing; in (4) substituted "disposition previously imposed" for "disposition imposed" and after "the district court may" inserted "after hearing"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective May 2, 1997.

Chapter 550 in (1) inserted reference to 41-5-1513. Amendment effective July 1, 1997.

Saving Clause: Section 50, Ch. 286, L. 1997, was a saving clause.

Section 79, Ch. 550, L. 1997, was a saving clause.

Applicability: Section 51, Ch. 286, L. 1997, provided: "[This act] applies to proceedings commenced after [the effective date of this act]." Effective October 1, 1997.

Section 17, Ch. 498, L. 1997, provided: "[This act] applies to all offenses committed on or after [the effective date of this act]." Effective May 2, 1997.

Severability: Section 15, Ch. 498, L. 1997, was a severability clause.

Section 80, Ch. 550, L. 1997, was a severability clause.

Effective Date: Section 10, Ch. 438, L. 1995, provided: "[This act] [41-5-208] is effective on passage and approval." Approved April 14, 1995.

Code Commissioner Change: In (1), the Code Commissioner deleted a reference to the former Department of Family Services transferring records to the Department of Corrections because the juvenile justice functions of both agencies were consolidated by Ch. 546, L. 1995.

Case Notes

Appropriate Conditions on Probation of Delinquent and Serious Youth Sex Offender: As a youth, D.A.S. was convicted of sexual assault and placed in a youth correctional facility. When D.A.S. turned 18, jurisdiction and supervisory responsibility were transferred from Youth Court to District Court until age 25, and numerous supervisory conditions were attached, including prohibitions on the use of drugs and alcohol, a curfew, and a requirement that D.A.S. obtain a GED 1 year prior to expiration of the sentence. D.A.S. objected to these conditions on grounds that they were unrelated to the crime of sexual assault, but the Supreme Court affirmed, applying St. v. Ashby, 2008 MT 83, 342, M 187, 179 P3d 1164 (2008), which allows imposition of conditions that have a nexus either to the offense or to the offender. In this case, both alcohol and drug prohibitions were reasonably related to D.A.S.'s rehabilitation and placement in a sexual offender program. A curfew was reasonable to ensure development of a consistent and healthy routine and was reasonable given legislative intent to provide youth offenders with additional supervision. Completion of the high school equivalency test was not an abuse of discretion because it was consistent with legislative intent to rehabilitate youth offenders through competency development, especially given D.A.S.'s expressed desire to further his education. In re D.A.S., 2008 MT 168, 343 M 360, 184 P3d 349 (2008).

No Authority of District Court to Impose Standard State Probation Conditions Upon Transfer of Jurisdiction From Youth Court to District Court: As a youth of 13, defendant committed sexual assault and was placed on probation with the condition that he complete an outpatient sexual offender treatment program. When the program had not been completed 2 years later, defendant's probation was revoked and he was placed at Pine Hills until age 18 and until completion of the Pine Hills sexual offender program, and if he failed to complete the program, he would be required to register as a sexual offender. When defendant turned 18, he was released from Pine Hills without completing the program. Defendant then stipulated to transfer supervisory control to District Court. The stipulation included a provision that defendant complete sexual offender treatment by age 25 and provided that defendant would have to register as a sexual offender if the treatment was not completed. Although the stipulation contained no other conditions or restrictions, defendant also signed a form that included the standard conditions of probation adopted by the Department of Corrections (DOC). Defendant subsequently violated some of the standard probation conditions, and the state petitioned to revoke probation. Defendant moved to dismiss the petition, but the District Court denied the motion and committed defendant to the DOC until age 25. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed. The stipulation placed only one condition on defendant, that being the requirement to complete sexual offender treatment by age 25. Defendant was not yet 25 years old, so that condition was not violated. The standard DOC probation conditions were imposed by the DOC, not by the court, and the DOC was not authorized to add conditions to those articulated by the court's judgment, nor did the court have authority to revoke defendant's probation for failure to abide by conditions added by the DOC after the sentence. Therefore, the District Court's judgment revoking defendant's probation and committing him to the DOC was reversible error. St. v. Andersen-Conway, 2007 MT 281, 339 M 439, 171 P3d 678 (2007).

State Breach of Plea Agreement — Remand for Resentencing in Conformity With Sentencing Stipulation: Pursuant to a plea bargain, a youth was placed on probation until age 18 with a sentencing stipulation that if the youth did not follow treatment plans or meet other requirements, the matter would be transferred to District Court and adult supervision. The youth subsequently violated probation and was sent to the Pine Hills correctional facility. The youth reoffended at Pine Hills, and the state moved to transfer the case to District Youth Court. Despite the sentencing stipulation, the state moved for a custodial sentence, and the Youth Court concurred with the state's recommendation and sentenced the youth to the Department of Corrections until age 25, with the last 3 years suspended. The youth appealed. The Supreme Court reversed. Both parties were bound by the terms of the plea agreement, and although the case was transferred to District Court as per the agreement, the state failed to follow the terms of the agreement when it sought a custodial sentence rather than adult supervision for the youth. Upon resentencing following the subsequent revocation for violation of sentencing conditions, the youth was entitled to receive the sentence that was presented to and approved by the Youth Court, and the Youth Court abused its discretion by failing to hold the state to the terms of the sentencing stipulation and by ordering the custodial sentence. On remand, the Youth Court was ordered to resentence the youth in accordance with the terms of the sentencing stipulation. In re H.C.R., 2007 MT 64, 336 M 369, 155 P3d 1221 (2007), following St. v. Rardon, 1999 MT 220, 296 M 19, 986 P2d 424 (1999), and St. v. Rardon, 2002 MT 345, 313 M 321, 61 P3d 132 (2002).

Revocation of Juvenile Offender's Suspended Sentence and Commitment to Department Authorized: Following a dispositional hearing, the Youth Court entered an order declaring Lesmeister a delinquent youth and serious juvenile offender, transferred the 18 year old's case to District Court, and placed the youth on probation until age 25, with the entire commitment suspended upon certain conditions. One year later, on a petition filed by the Cascade County Attorney alleging numerous probation violations, the District Court revoked Lesmeister's suspended sentence and committed the youth to the Department of Corrections until age 25. On appeal, Lesmeister challenged the legality of the court's commitment to the Department, arguing that because he was not incarcerated in a youth facility when his case was transferred to the District Court, this section allowed the court to impose only the conditions prescribed under 46-18-201 through 46-18-203, which did not include a sentence to the Department of Corrections. In affirming the District Court decision, the Supreme Court ruled that state law authorizes a District Court to impose a sentence to commit an offender to the Department of Corrections when all but the first 5 years are suspended. St. v. Lesmeister, 2000 MT 318, 302 M 500, 15 P3d 392, 57 St. Rep. 1344 (2000).

Youth Court Transfer Provision Illegal Mechanism to Rectify Youth's Failure to Pay Restitution — Ex Post Facto: As a teenager, Young entered a consent decree to dispose of three felony property offenses. He was ordered to pay $3,788 in restitution while on probation, but paid only $125. Later, Young was adjudicated as delinquent and sentenced to the Department of Corrections until age 18, with conditions. Restitution was not required, but the prior restitution was reinstated. Young then committed new offenses and was institutionalized until age 19, but restitution was not made by the time that he was 19. Young's cases were then transferred to District Court pursuant to this section, and he was placed on probation until the restitution was paid. Young appealed the transfer of the case, contending that he had successfully completed a residential treatment program in Utah according to the court's disposition order and that applying this section violated state and federal constitutional ex post facto provisions because the law was not in effect when he committed any of the offenses and because applying the transfer provisions would increase the possible penalty for offenses that he previously admitted. The Supreme Court found that ex post facto application of the transfer provisions did not provide a lawful mechanism to rectify Young's failure to pay restitution. Applying the two-part test in St. v. Leistiko, 256 M 32, 844 P2d 97 (1992), the court held that the transfer provision was retrospective because it was not in effect when Young committed the offenses and that this section is more onerous than the prior law because it changed the legal consequences by allowing the Youth Court to extend probation for an additional 6 years through transfer to the District Court. Since Young had successfully completed the Utah residential treatment program and was age 20 at the time that the appeal was decided, the cases should be closed. In re Young, 1999 MT 195, 295 M 394, 983 P2d 985, 56 St. Rep. 759 (1999).

Case Notes

Permissible Use of Records of Juvenile Crimes — Impeachment: Before his trial on charges of sexual intercourse without consent and sexual assault, the defendant filed a motion to allow his counsel to inspect the Youth Court records of any complaining witnesses on the grounds that the records might have a bearing on the competency and veracity of those witnesses. The motion was denied, and the judge said he would examine the records to determine if any of the girls should be examined by a psychologist before testifying. The Supreme Court found that the judge's ruling denying the defendant's motion to inspect denied him the right to confront the witnesses against him. However, their review of the juvenile records convinced them that the error here was harmless. They declined to adopt a rule allowing evidence of prior juvenile convictions to be used as evidence to attack the general credibility of a witness. The permissible use of those juvenile records was confined to demonstrating, by cross-examination, a witness's bias, prejudice, or motive. It was within the discretion of the trial judge to determine competency, and his findings would not be overturned absent an abuse of discretion. St. v. Camitsch, 192 M 124, 626 P2d 1250, 38 St. Rep. 563 (1981).

Juvenile Court Records Not Criminal: Trial court was not in error in reading into the record in open court prior events of defendant's life as disclosed by his juvenile court record where the juvenile court record was not challenged by defendant or his counsel. (See sections 10-601 through 10-611, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed).) St. v. Manning, 149 M 517, 429 P2d 625 (1967).

Use of Prior Juvenile Record: The reading into the record in open court of defendant's prior juvenile record was proper where the events contained in the juvenile record were not criminal. The court after reading the written record asked if there was any legal excuse why judgment and sentence of court should not be pronounced, and no challenge to the recited juvenile record was made. (See sections 10-601 through 10-611, R.C.M. 1947 (since repealed).) St. v. Manning, 149 M 517, 429 P2d 625 (1967).

(2) A petition for adoption filed prior to October 1, 1997, is governed by the law in effect at the time the petition was filed.

(3) The putative father registry requirements apply to children born on or after October 1, 1997."

1995 Amendments — Coordination Instruction — Composite Section: Chapter 251 in (1), after "fingerprints", inserted "DNA records"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective March 27, 1995. The amendment in (1) was rendered void by sec. 10, Ch. 466.

Section 5, Ch. 466, L. 1995, amended this section. Chapter 466 also contained a coordination instruction in sec. 10 that provided that if both Ch. 466 and House Bill No. 551 are passed and approved and if both include a section that amends 41-5-604, then 41-5-604 (renumbered 41-5-216) is to read as provided in the coordination instruction. House Bill No. 551 was approved as Ch. 251, L. 1995. In accordance with the coordination instruction, the amendments to this section contained in sec. 5, Ch. 466, L. 1995, are therefore void (see 1995 Session Law for text). Section 10, the coordination instruction, amended 41-5-604 (renumbered 41-5-216) as follows: in (1) inserted exception clause and after "law enforcement records" deleted "except fingerprints and photographs"; in (2), after "files", inserted "not exempt from sealing under subsection (5)"; in (5) inserted "fingerprints, DNA records, photographs" and at end substituted "in any case in which the youth did not fulfill all requirements of the court's judgment or disposition" for "directly related to an offense to which access must be allowed under 41-5-601"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 14, 1995.

Chapter 481 in (5), at end, inserted "or records referred to in 45-5-624(7)"; and made minor changes in style.

Chapter 528 in (1), at end of first sentence, substituted "sealed 3 years after supervision for an offense ends" for "sealed when the youth reaches the age of 18 years" and inserted second sentence allowing records to be unsealed; and made minor changes in style.

Style changes in the chapters were slightly different. In each case, the codifier chose the most appropriate.

1987 Amendment: At beginning of (1) substituted "All youth court records and law enforcement records except fingerprints and photographs" for "All court findings, orders, judgments, and the legal and social files and records of the court, probation services, and law enforcement agencies"; deleted last sentence of (4) that read: "The records of youths who were 28 years old or older on July 1, 1974, may be destroyed with the consent of the youth court judge or county attorney"; and at beginning of (5) inserted "The requirements for sealed records in", substituted "access" for "publicity", and deleted reference to subsection (2) of 41-5-601.

1981 Amendment: Inserted "or to records directly related to an offense to which publicity must be allowed under subsection (2) of 41-5-601" at the end of (5).

No Youth Court Authority to Expunge DUI Offenses — Elements of Judicial Estoppel Not Met: Following Darrah's completion of a Youth Drug Court program in 2004, the Youth Court ordered that Darrah's prior criminal record be expunged, including a previous minor in possession offense and a 2002 DUI. Darrah was subsequently charged in 2005 with second offense DUI, based on the prior 2002 DUI, and in 2006 Darrah was charged with third offense DUI. Citing the principle of judicial estoppel, Darrah asserted that because the Youth Court record had been expunged, the 2002 DUI should not count against him. The District Court disagreed and Darrah appealed. The Supreme Court applied the elements of judicial estoppel set out in Vogel v. Intercontinental Truck Body, Inc., 2006 MT 131, 332 M 322, 137 P3d 573 (2006), and determined that Darrah had failed to demonstrate that each element was met, so judicial estoppel did not apply. Further, there is no authority under which the Youth Court could order expungement of Darrah's DUI offenses. The District Court was affirmed. St. v. Darrah, 2009 MT 96, 350 M 70, 205 P3d 792 (2009), following St. v. Chesley, 2004 MT 165, 322 M 26, 92 P3d 1212 (2004).

Inclusion of Juvenile Record in Presentence Report: Section 41-3-205 does not support appellant's contention that it was improper to include his juvenile record in a presentence report since that section applies only to dependence and neglect situations and not to proceedings for delinquents under the Montana Youth Court Act. Section 41-5-604 (renumbered 41-5-216) does not support appellant's contention either, because the prevention of public dissemination of a juvenile record once that individual attains an age of majority is accomplished by sealing the presentence report. St. v. Radi, 185 M 38, 604 P2d 318 (1979).

Attorney General's Opinions

Certain Youth Court Records Not Subject to Sealing Requirements: A 1987 amendment to 41-5-601 (now repealed) deleted the bar against disseminating information concerning proceedings to find a youth delinquent; further, the intent of a 1987 amendment to subsection (5) of this section (formerly 41-5-604(5)) was to not seal the records related to delinquency proceedings. The overall effect of the 1987 amendments was that Youth Court records concerning a youth proceeded against as a delinquent youth or found to be a delinquent youth are not confidential and are not subject to sealing requirements of the Montana Youth Court Act. 43 A.G. Op. 7 (1989).

Youth Court Act — Applicability to Alcohol Possession Proceedings in Other Courts: The provisions of the Montana Youth Court Act that apply to a youth charged with a violation of 45-5-624, illegal possession of alcohol, in justice's, municipal, or city court proceedings are 41-5-303 through 41-5-307 (renumbered 41-5-322, 41-5-331, 41-5-341, 41-5-344 (now repealed), and 41-5-1206), 41-5-402 (renumbered 41-5-1303), 41-5-601 (now repealed), 41-5-602 (now repealed), and this section (formerly 41-5-604). A youth charged with a violation of 45-5-624 is further entitled to the following rights in addition to those normally accorded defendants in justice's, municipal, or city court criminal proceedings: (1) service of the criminal summons on both the youth and a custodial parent or guardian; (2) advisement of the right to retained or, if appropriate, appointed counsel; and (3) waiver of the right to counsel only by both the youth and a custodial parent or guardian. 40 A.G. Op. 43 (1984). (Annotator's note: Chapter 105, sec. 1, L. 1985, amended 45-5-624 to remove imprisonment from the list of sentences that can be imposed upon youths convicted of violating the statute.)

Part Case Notes

Holding Youth Without Appearance Until Transfer to District Court: Defendant claims he was not brought to a magistrate "without necessary delay". Defendant surrendered to the authorities and was placed in jail but was not taken before a magistrate until some 20 days later. Although defendant could show no prejudice due to this lapse of time, the Supreme Court strongly disapproved of any deliberate attempt by the State to avoid arraignment "without unnecessary delay" by first arresting and holding a juvenile under the Youth Court Act for a sustained period of time and then later attempting to prosecute the juvenile as an adult. The Supreme Court stated that if a defendant could show prejudice or a deliberate attempt by the prosecution to circumvent a speedy arraignment, they would not hesitate to fashion an appropriate remedy. St. v. Rodriguez, 192 M 411, 628 P2d 280, 38 St. Rep. 578F (1981).

Case Notes

Truant Smelling of Alcohol — Particularized Suspicion for Arrest — Motion to Suppress Properly Denied: A 14-year-old boy's mother called his school, reported that he had not returned home the previous night, and requested that he be picked up. The school resource officer notified police and asked that the boy be brought to school if found. An officer later found the boy on the street smelling of alcohol and took the boy to the police station where it was discovered that several town businesses had been burglarized during the night, including a bowling alley where money and liquor had been stolen. Money and liquor were found on the youth, and his shoes were taken as evidence to see if they matched prints found at the bowling alley. The youth moved that all evidence be suppressed, but the motion was denied. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Based on the fact that the officer smelled alcohol on the youth, the officer's particularized suspicion that the youth had been drinking developed into probable cause to believe that the youth committed the offense of consuming or possessing alcohol. Because the officer had probable cause to make an immediate arrest, including the fact that the boy had been reported missing from home and was truant from school, it was constitutionally permissible to take the boy into custody pursuant to this section and reasonable to conduct a search pursuant to that arrest for the youth's safety. In re Z.M., 2007 MT 122, 337 M 278, 160 P3d 490 (2007).

Illegal Pretrial Process and Procedure — State's Right to Charge and Try Case: Youth Court petition initiating proceedings did not state the facts constituting the offense youth was charged with in ordinary and concise language so as to enable a person of common understanding to know what was intended. The petition did not include a witness list. An arrest warrant was issued out of the Youth Court, although there is no provision in the Youth Court Act for issuance of an arrest warrant. Presumably the warrant was issued under 46-6-201, but there was no showing of probable cause supported by oath or affirmation reduced to writing. The youth had already been arrested in Oklahoma at the time the warrant was issued. By what process and authority he was arrested in Oklahoma was not shown, nor was it shown he was arrested by a law enforcement officer. He was subsequently transferred to the District Court for trial as an adult and convicted of two counts of deliberate homicide. The Youth Court proceedings from issuance of the warrant for arrest onward were patently defective. However, this did not preclude the state from having him transferred to the District Court, proceeding against him, and obtaining a conviction. St. v. Woods, 203 M 401, 662 P2d 579, 40 St. Rep. 533 (1983).

Youth Court Act — Applicability to Alcohol Possession Proceedings in Other Courts: The provisions of the Montana Youth Court Act that apply to a youth charged with a violation of 45-5-624, illegal possession of alcohol, in justice's, municipal, or city court proceedings are 41-5-303 through 41-5-307 (renumbered 41-5-322, 41-5-331, 41-5-341, 41-5-344 (now repealed), and 41-5-1206), 41-5-402 (renumbered 41-5-1303), 41-5-601 (now repealed), 41-5-602 (now repealed), and 41-5-604 (renumbered 41-5-216). A youth charged with a violation of 45-5-624 is further entitled to the following rights in addition to those normally accorded defendants in justice's, municipal, or city court criminal proceedings: (1) service of the criminal summons on both the youth and a custodial parent or guardian; (2) advisement of the right to retained or, if appropriate, appointed counsel; and (3) waiver of the right to counsel only by both the youth and a custodial parent or guardian. 40 A.G. Op. 43 (1984). (Annotator's note: Chapter 105, sec. 1, L. 1985, amended 45-5-624 to remove imprisonment from the list of sentences that can be imposed upon youths convicted of violating the statute.)

Circumstances — Read Conjunctively: The factors listed in 41-5-307(2) (renumbered 41-5-322(2) and (3)) that provide the circumstances under which a youth may be detained in adult facilities are to be read conjunctively. A youth may be detained only when detention or care is required to protect the person or property of the youth or others or he may abscond or be removed from the community. 37 A.G. Op. 94 (1977).

2009 Amendments — Composite Section: Chapter 2 in (1)(b) near beginning before "probation officer" inserted "juvenile". Amendment effective October 1, 2009.

Chapter 37 at end of (2)(a) and (2)(b) inserted "subject to the provisions of 41-5-333(2)"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2009.

1997 Amendment: Chapter 286 deleted former (1)(b)(i) through (1)(b)(iii) that read: "(b) The youth may waive these rights under the following situations:

(i) when the youth is 16 years of age or older, the youth may make an effective waiver;

(ii) when the youth is under the age of 16 years and the youth and a parent or guardian agree, they may make an effective waiver; and

(iii) when the youth is under the age of 16 years and the youth and his parent or guardian do not agree, the youth may make an effective waiver only with advice of counsel"; inserted (2) establishing when youth may waive rights; deleted former (2) through (8) that read: "(2) Unless a youth has been released, a hearing must be held within 24 hours after the youth is taken into custody, excluding weekends and legal holidays, to determine whether there is probable cause to believe that the youth is a delinquent youth or a youth in need of supervision.

(3) The probable cause hearing required under subsection (2) may be held by the youth court, a justice of the peace, a municipal or city judge, or a magistrate having jurisdiction in the case as provided in 41-5-203. If the probable cause hearing is held by a justice of the peace, a municipal or city judge, or a magistrate, a record of the hearing must be made by a court reporter or by a tape recording of the hearing.

(4) At the probable cause hearing, the youth must be informed of his constitutional rights and his rights under this chapter.

(5) A parent, guardian, or legal custodian of the youth may be held in contempt of court for failing to be present at or to participate in the probable cause hearing unless he:

(a) cannot be located through diligent efforts of the investigating peace officer or peace officers; or

(b) is excused by the court for good cause.

(6) At the probable cause hearing, a guardian ad litem may be appointed as provided in 41-5-512.

(7) If it is determined that there is probable cause to believe the youth is a delinquent youth or is a youth in need of supervision, the court having jurisdiction in the case shall determine whether the youth should be retained in custody. If the court determines that continued custody of the youth is necessary and if the youth meets the criteria in 41-5-305, the youth may be placed in a detention facility or shelter care facility as provided in 41-5-306 but may not be placed in a jail or other facility used for the confinement of adults accused or convicted of criminal offenses.

(8) If probable cause is not found or if a probable cause hearing is not held within the time specified in subsection (2), the youth must be immediately released from custody"; and made minor changes in style.

The amendments to this section made by sec. 21, Ch. 550, L. 1997, were rendered void by sec. 49(3)(d), Ch. 286, L. 1997, a coordination section.

Saving Clause: Section 50, Ch. 286, L. 1997, was a saving clause.

Applicability: Section 51, Ch. 286, L. 1997, provided: "[This act] applies to proceedings commenced after [the effective date of this act]." Effective October 1, 1997.

Code Commissioner Change: Section 76, Ch. 550, L. 1997, instructed the Code Commissioner, in the Montana Code Annotated or in legislation enacted by the 1997 Legislature, to change references to youth in need of supervision to references to youth in need of intervention. The change has been made in this section.

1991 Amendment: In (1) substituted "a delinquent youth or a youth in need of supervision" for "delinquent or in need of supervision"; in (2), at beginning, inserted "Unless a youth has been released" and deleted requirement that hearing be "held by the court, a justice of the peace, a municipal or city judge, or a magistrate"; in (3) inserted first sentence concerning holding of probable cause hearing; in (5), after "present at", inserted "or participate in"; in (7), after "delinquent", inserted "youth", after "supervision" inserted "the court having jurisdiction in the case shall determine whether the youth should be retained in custody. If the court determines that continued custody of the youth is necessary", and at end substituted "facility used for the confinement of adults accused or convicted of criminal offenses" for "facility for adults"; in (8), after "not found", inserted "or if a probable cause hearing is not held within the time specified in subsection (2)" and at end inserted "from custody"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1992.

1989 Amendment: In (2), in first sentence after "court", inserted "a justice of the peace, a municipal or city judge, or a magistrate" and inserted second sentence relating to a record of the hearing; in (3) substituted "the youth shall be informed" for "the court shall inform the youth"; in (5) substituted "a guardian ad litem may be appointed" for "the court may appoint a guardian ad litem"; and in (6), near beginning of first sentence, substituted "it is determined" for "the court determines" and in last sentence substituted "probable cause is not found" for "the court does not find probable cause". Amendment effective July 1, 1989.

1987 Amendments: Chapter 475 near beginning of (1) substituted "taken into custody" for "detained"; inserted (1)(c) requiring investigating officer, probation officer, or assigned person to immediately notify parents, guardian, or legal custodian when youth is taken into custody and reasons for such custody; inserted (2) through (6) regarding rights of youth taken into custody, probable cause hearing, possible parental contempt citation for failure to attend hearing, and detention upon finding of delinquent youth or youth in need of supervision; and in (6), at end of first sentence, inserted "but may not be placed in a jail or other facility for adults", effective July 1, 1989.

Chapter 515 in (1), before "questioning", deleted "investigation or" and after "alleging that the youth" deleted "being detained"; in (1)(a), after "shall be", deleted "immediately and effectively" and changed reference to constitutional rights and rights under this chapter to reference to rights against self-incrimination and counsel; in (1)(b)(i) changed age restriction from under age 12 to age 16 or older and deleted provision that parents may make a waiver; in (1)(b)(ii) changed age restriction from over age 12 to under age 16 and added provision that a guardian as well as a parent may make a waiver; and in (1)(b)(iii) changed age restriction from over age 12 to under age 16 and added provision that if a guardian or a parent does not agree to waiver, the youth may make waiver only with advice of counsel.

Case Notes

Waiver of Miranda Rights by 16-Year-Old Youth — Rights Adequately Explained: Following a report by a father that his 16-year-old son had been found in his sister's bedroom, a deputy took the boy to the Sheriff's office for an interview. The deputy conscientiously explained the Miranda warning to the boy, and the boy said that he understood the rights and waived those rights. The boy then confessed to sexual contact with his sister and was charged with felony sexual assault. The boy moved to suppress the confession but the motion was denied. On appeal, the Supreme Court reviewed the interview and concluded that the boy met the age requirement for providing a valid waiver without his parents' consent or counsel present and that the deputy took appropriate care in explaining the Miranda warning and engaged in no impermissible tactics in seeking to extract a confession. Thus, the boy's waiver of Miranda rights was valid. The Youth Court's findings of facts were not clearly erroneous and the suppression motion was properly denied. In re S.M.S., 2010 MT 18, 355 Mont. 102, 225 P.3d 781.

Custodial Interrogation of Youth Without Consent — Miranda Warning Required — Suppression of Confession and Withdrawal of Guilty Plea Required: A 14-year-old boy's mother called his school, reported that he had not returned home the previous night, and requested that he be picked up. The school resource officer notified police and asked that the boy be brought to school if found. An officer later found the boy on the street smelling of alcohol and took the boy to the police station where it was discovered that several town businesses had been burglarized during the night, including a bowling alley where money and liquor had been stolen. Although there was no record that the youth was advised of his Miranda rights, during interrogation both prior to and after arrival of his parents, the youth confessed to robbing the bowling alley and subsequently pleaded guilty to felony burglary. The Youth Court summarily determined that the confessions were voluntary, denied a motion to suppress, found the youth was delinquent, and ordered 2 years' probation. On appeal, the Supreme Court addressed the voluntariness of the confessions and reversed. Given the absence of a tangible record that the officer read Miranda rights to the youth or that the youth or the parents consented in writing to a waiver of Miranda rights or agreed to the interview, the requirement in this section that a youth be advised of the right against self-incrimination and the right to counsel was violated. Thus, the confessions could not be considered voluntary and should have been suppressed by the Youth Court. The Supreme Court also ordered that on remand, the youth be allowed to withdraw the guilty plea In re Z.M., 2007 MT 122, 337 M 278, 160 P3d 490 (2007).

No Capacity or Actual Authority of Youth to Consent to Search of Parent's Home: While conducting a search for Lowe, officers learned that Lowe was staying at Schwarz's home and drove to Schwarz's residence to initiate an arrest. Schwarz was not home, but Schwarz's 13-year-old daughter answered the door and consented to a search of the residence. Without attempting to contact Schwarz, the officers entered the home without a warrant and discovered drugs. When Schwarz arrived home, she was arrested for possession of dangerous drugs. Following conviction, Schwarz appealed on grounds that the search was illegal because the minor daughter did not have authority to consent to a search of the home. The Supreme Court agreed and reversed, adopting a per se rule that a youth under the age of 16 years has neither the capacity nor the actual authority to relinquish a parent's privacy rights and consent to a search of the parent's home. St. v. Schwarz, 2006 MT 120, 332 M 243, 136 P3d 989 (2006). See also St. v. Melees, 2000 MT 6, 298 M 15, 994 P2d 683 (2000).

Youth's Right to Parental Notification — Suppression of Statements for Failure to Notify Parents: McKee, a youth charged with assault with a weapon, contended that police erred by failing to notify his parents prior to questioning or to inform him of the right to waive notification and that statements made prior to notification should have been suppressed. The trial court denied the suppression motion, reasoning that this section provided the parents, not the youth, with the right to notification, so it was not a right that McKee could waive. The Supreme Court disagreed. The right of parental notification belongs to the youth, not to the parents. McKee did not waive the right, so statements made prior to parental notification should have been suppressed, and failure to do so was reversible error. St. v. McKee, 2006 MT 5, 330 M 249, 127 P3d 445 (2006).

Use of Youth's Voluntary Confession of Drug Use in Subsequent Probation Violation Proceedings Not Error: A youth admitted that she had used methamphetamine, as part of an agreement with the County Attorney and in exchange for a recommendation that the youth be placed in a drug treatment program. When the youth violated the terms of her probation, the confession of prior drug use was admitted into evidence. The youth contended that the self-incriminating statement was inadmissible because the youth was not informed that the statement could later be used against her if she violated probation. The Supreme Court declined to reverse the Youth Court's disposition simply because the youth was not advised that the admission could be used later and instead noted that if the confession was voluntary and not coerced, it could properly be used at a later trial for drug possession. Further, under In re C.L., 2004 MT 71, 320 M 369, 87 P3d 462 (2004), the fact that an admission is voluntary is all that is required for a confession to be admissible in a Youth Court proceeding. In this case, the youth was not placed in a position in which she was coerced into waiving the right against self-incrimination by a threat of penalty, but rather voluntarily admitted drug use as a condition of sentencing to a drug treatment program in a manner similar to a plea bargain agreement. Thus, the Youth Court did not err in allowing the youth's admission into evidence and in taking judicial notice of the youth's waiver of the right against self-incrimination. In re R.L.H., 2005 MT 177, 327 M 520, 116 P3d 791 (2005).

Youth's Waiver of Rights When Parent and Youth in Separate Places — No Specific Topic of Questioning — Admissibility of Confession: After a fire in a clandestine methamphetamine laboratory, police sought to question a youth who was reported to be involved. With the youth's mother present, the officers informed them of the youth's various rights, gave them a written statement of rights, and allowed them to discuss waiver of the rights. In the youth's presence, the mother signed a consent to waive the youth's rights. The youth was then taken to the station without his mother, who declined to go, was informed of his rights again and signed a waiver of rights, and was questioned about the fire and the laboratory. The youth subsequently confessed to involvement in the drug operation, and the District Court declared him delinquent and entered a dispositional order. On appeal, the youth contended that the confession should have been suppressed because he and his mother did not agree together to waive his rights and because his mother was led to believe that the questioning was about the fire and not the laboratory, so she could not effectively waive his rights without accurate knowledge of the basis of the questioning, citing Evans v. District Court, 2000 MT 38, 298 M 279, 995 P2d 455 (2000). The Supreme Court disagreed. Nothing in Evans or in this section requires that a youth and parent agree as to the specific topic of questioning to which a waiver of rights applies in order to make the waiver effective, nor does this section require the agreement of the youth and parent in the same place at the same time. The youth also failed to show that the confession was involuntary through police deceit because he should have known that any interview regarding the fire could involve questions regarding the drug operation. In re C.L., 2004 MT 71, 320 M 369, 87 P3d 462 (2004).

Lack of Advisement of Right to Counsel and Right Against Self-Incrimination for Youth Taken Into Custody for Questioning Reversible Error — When Waiver of Rights Attaches: A youth was questioned at the Sheriff's office regarding a burglary and criminal mischief and was then taken home, where he agreed to relinquish articles of clothing that were not inconsistent with evidence found at the crime scene. The youth's parents were not notified of any of the Sheriff's actions, and no omnibus hearing was held. The youth's clothing was later introduced at trial over the youth's objection. Following conviction, the youth appealed, contending that the clothing was not legally obtained pursuant to a search warrant, that he was not advised of his rights, and that he did not give an informed waiver of his right to have his parents contacted prior to relinquishment of the clothing. The state maintained that the youth voluntarily consented to relinquish the clothing and thus waived his rights. The Supreme Court reversed. Under the Montana Youth Court Act, a youth taken into custody for questioning on a matter that could result in allegations that the youth is delinquent must be advised of the right to counsel and the right against self-incrimination, and the youth's parents must be immediately notified by the investigating officer. A youth who is 16 years of age or older may make an effective waiver of those rights. In determining whether waiver and consent by juveniles are voluntary, the Supreme Court applies the totality of circumstances test set out in Evans v. District Court, 2000 MT 38, 298 M 279, 995 P2d 455 (2000), which provides that a determination of voluntariness takes into account: (1) the defendant's age and level of education; (2) whether the defendant was advised of the defendant's rights; (3) the defendant's prior experience with the criminal justice system; (4) the defendant's background and experience; and (5) the defendant's demeanor, coherence, articulateness, and capacity to make full use of the defendant's faculties. Here, the District Court failed to take the Evans factors into account, and the requirements of this section regarding parental notification were not fulfilled. Failure to follow statutory requirements and to consider the totality of the circumstances was reversible error. In re C.T.P., 2004 MT 63, 320 M 279, 87 P3d 399 (2004).

Plain Error in Allowing Youth's Extrajudicial Statements When Youth Not Advised of Right to Counsel and Right Against Self-Incrimination: A youth asserted for the first time on appeal that the Youth Court improperly admitted extrajudicial statements that the youth made regarding the youth's whereabouts when a burglary and criminal mischief were committed. Despite the state's contention that the arguments should not be considered because they were not raised at trial, the Supreme Court nevertheless considered the argument under the plain error doctrine because the youth was not notified while in custody of the fundamental right to counsel and the right to avoid self-incrimination, nor were the youth's parents notified as required. The youth's rights under the Montana Youth Court Act and the constitution were simply ignored in this case, so in order to avoid a question of the fundamental fairness of the trial by admission of constitutionally infirm extrajudicial statements, the Supreme Court reversed the trial court's decision to admit the statements. In re C.T.P., 2004 MT 63, 320 M 279, 87 P3d 399 (2004).

Youth Considered in Custody — Supervisory Control Appropriate When Lower Court Proceeding Under Mistake of Law: Fourteen-year-old Evans was taken by his mother to the Flathead County Sheriff's office, upon request of the Deputy Sheriff, because he had been observed talking to a child on the day of her disappearance. Evans and his mother were separated upon arrival at the office, and Evans was taken to a 9-by-9-foot windowless interrogation room with a shut door where he was questioned for 2 ½ hours by two officers wearing badges and weapons. Evans waived his Miranda rights outside the presence and without the consent of his mother and without an opportunity to discuss his rights or the waiver with counsel. The officers did not tell Evans that he could leave the interrogation room or consult with his mother, and during the course of the interview, Evans' mother was denied contact with Evans. Although initially adamantly denying involvement, the officers repeatedly suggested that Evans had "more to tell them" and misled him into believing that the police had fingerprints from the girl's body that could be matched to his. Toward the end of the interrogation, Evans confessed that he drowned the child and was charged with her death, arrested, handcuffed, and escorted to juvenile detention without an opportunity to speak to his mother. Evans filed a motion to suppress the confession on grounds that his waiver of rights while in custody was invalid under this section. The District Court denied the motion, concluding that Evans was not in custody during the interview and that the confession was voluntary. Accepting supervisory control because the District Court was proceeding under a mistake of law, the Supreme Court, finding it difficult to imagine a more "custodial" setting, applied the factors in St. v. Staat, 251 M 1, 822 P2d 643, 48 St. Rep. 1041 (1991), and concluded that Evans was in custody during the interview, that his waiver of rights without the consent of a parent or advice of counsel was invalid under this section, and that the confession was not voluntary under the totality of the circumstances. Although the record on appeal was not sufficient to determine whether the state had other evidence sufficient to charge Evans, the case was nevertheless remanded for consideration of the evidence without the confession. Evans v. District Court, 2000 MT 38, 298 M 279, 995 P2d 455, 57 St. Rep. 175 (2000), followed, with regard to applicability of the totality of circumstances test for determining voluntariness of a juvenile's waiver and consent, in In re C.T.P., 2004 MT 63, 320 M 279, 87 P3d 399 (2004). See also State ex rel. D.M.B. v. District Court, 2004 MT 335, 324 M 190, 103 P3d 514 (2004).

Transfer of Youth Court Case to District Court Not Violative of Minor's Constitutional Rights: Spina argued that the statute allowing transfer of her Youth Court case to the District Court resulted in violation of her rights under Art. II, sec. 15, Mont. Const., which guarantees to minors the same fundamental rights afforded to adults, and under Art. II, sec. 24, Mont. Const., which guarantees the right to a fair trial. The Supreme Court considered alleged violations of the right against self-incrimination, the right to effective assistance of counsel, the right to a fair trial, and the right to a presumption of innocence, finding that Spina's arguments were without merit. The transfer statute did not violate Spina's constitutional rights. St. v. Spina, 1999 MT 113, 294 M 367, 982 P2d 421, 56 St. Rep. 467 (1999).

Warrantless Entry and Arrest Valid — Subsequent Search Invalid — No Consent: While the officers' initial entry into the apartment and the subsequent arrest and seizure of marijuana on the table were valid, the so-called "consent" search of the rest of the apartment was unlawful. One renter's consent was fraudulently secured and otherwise invalid under this section (formerly 41-5-303). St. v. Allen, 188 M 135, 612 P2d 199 (1980).

1987 Amendments — Composite Section: Chapter 475 at beginning of (1) substituted "After a probable cause hearing provided for in 41-5-303, a youth may not be placed in a detention facility" for "A youth taken into custody may not be detained in a jail or other facility for detention purposes"; in (1)(a) substituted "one of the following acts" for "an act" and after "offense" deleted former (1)(a) that read: "(a) the alleged act is one of the following"; inserted (1)(d) and (1)(e) prohibiting placement of a youth in a detention facility unless his detention is required to protect persons or property or there is good reason to believe youth will not appear for court proceedings; at end of (1)(h) inserted "in the judicial district with jurisdiction over the youth"; and near beginning of (2), after "youth", deleted "taken into custody" and substituted "placed in a shelter care facility unless" for "sheltered prior to the hearing on the petition except when".

Chapter 515 at end of (1)(a) substituted "offense is one specified in 41-5-206" for "act is one of the following"; deleted former (1)(a)(i) through (1)(a)(x) that read: "(i) criminal homicide as defined in 45-5-101;

(ii) arson as defined in 45-6-103;

(iii) aggravated or felony assault as defined in 45-5-202;

(iv) robbery as defined in 45-5-401;

(v) burglary or aggravated burglary as defined in 45-6-204;

(vi) sexual intercourse without consent as defined in 45-5-503;

(vii) aggravated kidnapping as defined in 45-5-303;

(viii) possession of explosives as defined in 45-8-335;

(ix) criminal sale of dangerous drugs for profit as included in 45-9-101; or

(x) attempt as defined in 45-4-103 of any of the acts enumerated in subsections (1)(a)(i) through (1)(a)(ix)"; in (1)(b), after "correctional", inserted "or detention"; inserted (1)(d), (1)(f), and (1)(g) citing circumstances under which youth may be placed in detention facility; and in (1)(h), after "meets", inserted "additional" and after "court" inserted "in the judicial district that has current jurisdiction over him".

Chapter 610 in former (1)(a)(i) substituted "homicide as defined in 45-5-102 through 45-5-104" for "criminal homicide as defined in 45-5-101" (not codified as explained below).

In preparation of the composite of the Ch. 475, Ch. 515, and Ch. 610 amendments to this section, the Code Commissioner omitted from the composite the Ch. 475 amendment to subsection (1)(a) that referred to "one of the following acts" because the phrase referred to former (1)(a)(i) through (1)(a)(x), which were deleted by Ch. 515.

The Code Commissioner used the Ch. 515 amendment to subsection (1)(h) rather than the Ch. 475 amendment, which was similar, because the Ch. 515 amendment contained the additional qualifier of "current" jurisdiction. Any inconsistency between the official enrolled bills and the MCA is to be resolved in favor of the official enrolled bills (see 1-11-103).

1985 Amendment: In (1) substituted language relating to circumstances in which youth could be placed in a jail or detention facility for former (1) that read: "A youth taken into custody may not be detained prior to the hearing on the petition except when:

(a) his detention is required to protect the person or the property of others or of the youth;

(b) he has pending court or administrative action or is awaiting a transfer to another jurisdiction and may abscond or be removed from the jurisdiction of the court;

(c) there are not adequate assurances that the youth will appear for court when required; or

(d) an order for his detention has been made by the court".

Youth Court Act — Applicability to Alcohol Possession Proceedings in Other Courts: The provisions of the Montana Youth Court Act that apply to a youth charged with a violation of 45-5-624, illegal possession of alcohol, in justice's, municipal, or city court proceedings are 41-5-303 through 41-5-307 (renumbered 41-5-322, 41-5-331, 41-5-341, 41-5-344 (now repealed), and 41-5-1206), 41-5-402 (renumbered 41-5-1303), 41-5-601 (now repealed), 41-5-602 (now repealed), and 41-5-604 (renumbered 41-5-216). A youth charged with a violation of 45-5-624 is further entitled to the following rights in addition to those normally accorded defendants in justice's, municipal, or city court criminal proceedings: (1) service of the criminal summons on both the youth and a custodial parent or guardian; (2) advisement of the right to retained or, if appropriate, appointed counsel; and (3) waiver of the right to counsel only by both the youth and a custodial parent or guardian. 40 A.G. Op. 43 (1984). (Annotator's note: Chapter 105, sec. 1, L. 1985, amended 45-5-624 to remove imprisonment from the list of sentences that can be imposed upon youths convicted of violating the statute.)

The change has been made in this section.

Case Notes

Absence of Youth Court Procedure to Determine Competency of Youths Not Violative of Equal Protection: Attorneys for a 9-year-old youth charged with arson contended that the youth lacked the capacity to form the requisite mental intent to commit the crime and that the youth was too young to understand the process against him and to effectively assist in his defense. A motion was made to dismiss. The Youth Court determined that the youth understood the charges and his rights and sentenced the youth to 2 years' probation. On appeal, the youth asserted that the Youth Court Act violated the constitutional guarantee of equal protection by not providing a procedure to evaluate the competency of youths similar to the procedure for determining the competency of adults to stand trial. The Supreme Court disagreed. A youth alleging incompetency based on immaturity is not similarly situated to an adult criminal defendant alleging mental disease or defect. All youths experience a period of immaturity, which most youths outgrow, but the same cannot be said for a mental disease or defect. The court noted that the logical extension of the youth's argument would require that immature youths be placed in mental health facilities until they are mature enough to stand trial. Because immature youths are not similarly situated to adult criminal defendants alleging mental disease or defect, equal protection was not implicated. In this case, substantial evidence indicated that the youth could consult with his attorneys and understand the proceedings against him and that the youth could form the requisite criminal intent of purposely and knowingly starting a fire. The youth was fit to proceed and did not suffer from a mental disorder, and the youth's due process rights were protected by hearings at which the youth's competency to proceed was determined. The Youth Court was affirmed. In re G.T.M., 2009 MT 443, 354 M 197, 222 P3d 626 (2009). See also State ex rel. Elliot v. District Court, 211 M 1, 684 P2d 481 (1984).

2009 Amendment: Chapter 2 in (1) near end and in (2) near beginning before "probation officer" inserted "juvenile". Amendment effective October 1, 2009.

2001 Amendment: Chapter 114 in middle of (2) inserted "as defined in 41-3-102". Amendment effective October 1, 2001.

1997 Amendments: Chapter 185 in (1), after "person", inserted "including a parent or guardian of a youth"; and made minor changes in style.

Chapter 286 in (1), near middle, substituted "youth in need of intervention" for "youth in need of supervision" and near end inserted "or an assessment officer"; deleted former (2) that read: "(2) The probation officer may:

(a) require the presence of any person relevant to the inquiry;

(b) request subpoenas from the judge to accomplish this purpose;

(c) require investigation of the matter by any law enforcement agency or any other appropriate state or local agency"; in (2) inserted "or assessment officer" and substituted "indicate that the youth is a youth in need of care" for "indicate a youth in need of care"; deleted (4) through (8) that read: "(4) (a) The probation officer in the conduct of the preliminary inquiry shall:

(i) advise the youth of the youth's rights under this chapter and the constitutions of the state of Montana and the United States;

(ii) determine whether the matter is within the jurisdiction of the court;

(iii) determine, if the youth is in detention or shelter care, whether detention or shelter care should be continued based upon criteria set forth in 41-5-305.

(b) Once relevant information is secured, the probation officer shall:

(i) determine whether the interest of the public or the youth requires that further action be taken;

(ii) terminate the inquiry upon the determination that no further action be taken; and

(iii) release the youth immediately upon the determination that the filing of a petition is not authorized.

(5) The probation officer upon determining that further action is required may:

(a) provide counseling, refer the youth and the youth's parents to another agency providing appropriate services, or take any other action or make any informal adjustment that does not involve probation or detention;

(b) provide for treatment or adjustment involving probation or other disposition authorized under 41-5-401 through 41-5-403 if the treatment or adjustment is voluntarily accepted by the youth's parents or guardian and the youth, if the matter is referred immediately to the county attorney for review, and if the probation officer proceeds no further unless authorized by the county attorney; or

(c) refer the matter to the county attorney for filing a petition charging the youth to be a delinquent youth or a youth in need of supervision.

(6) The county attorney may apply to the youth court for permission to file a petition charging a youth to be a delinquent youth or a youth in need of supervision. The application must be supported by evidence that the youth court may require. If it appears that there is probable cause to believe that the allegations of the petition are true, the youth court shall grant leave to file the petition.

(7) A petition charging a youth held in detention must be filed within 7 working days from the date the youth was first taken into custody or the petition must be dismissed and the youth released unless good cause is shown to further detain the youth.

(8) If a petition is not filed under this section, the complainant and victim, if any, must be informed by the probation officer of the action and the reasons for not filing and must be advised of the right to submit the matter to the county attorney for review. The county attorney, upon receiving a request for review, shall consider the facts, consult with the probation officer, and make the final decision as to whether a petition is filed"; and made minor changes in style.

2009 Amendment: Chapter 2 in (1)(f) in five places before reference to probation officer inserted "juvenile"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2009.

1997 Amendments: Chapter 185 inserted (1)(f) allowing confiscation of a youth's driver's license; and made minor changes in style.

Chapter 550 in (1) substituted "by consent adjustment" for "by informal adjustment"; at end of (1)(b) and (1)(c) substituted "pursuant to a recommendation made under 41-5-525" (renumbered 41-5-121) for "as determined by the department"; in (1)(d) inserted reference to 41-5-1521; inserted (1)(g) through (1)(n) allowing counseling, assessment, detention, community service, victim-offender mediation, contribution for costs, contribution for victim's costs, or any other conditions; deleted former (2) that read: "(2) In determining whether restitution is appropriate in a particular case, the following factors may be considered in addition to any other evidence:

(a) age of the youth;

(b) ability of the youth to pay;

(c) ability of the parents, legal guardian, or persons contributing to the youth's delinquency or need for supervision to pay;

(d) amount of damage to the victim; and

(e) legal remedies of the victim. However, the ability of the victim or the victim's insurer to stand any loss may not be considered in any case"; in (2), in first sentence, substituted "a parole agreement" for "an aftercare agreement" and in second sentence substituted "under consent adjustment" for "under informal adjustment"; in (3) substituted "placed in substitute care, an assessment placement, or detention requiring payment by any state department or local government agency" for "placed in substitute care requiring payment by the department" and after "a contribution covering all or part of the costs for the" inserted "adjudication, disposition, supervision"; deleted (5) through (7) that read: "(5) If the court determines that the youth's parents or guardians are financially able to pay a contribution as provided in subsection (4), the court shall order the youth's parents or guardians to pay an amount based on the uniform child support guidelines adopted by the department of public health and human services pursuant to 40-5-209.

(6) (a) Except as provided in subsection (6)(b), contributions ordered under this section and each modification of an existing order are enforceable by immediate or delinquency income withholding, or both, under Title 40, chapter 5, part 4. An order for contribution that is inconsistent with this section is nevertheless subject to withholding for the payment of the contribution without need for an amendment of the support order or for any further action by the court.

(b) A court-ordered exception from contributions under this section must be in writing and be included in the order. An exception from the immediate income withholding requirement may be granted if the court finds there is:

(i) good cause not to require immediate income withholding; or

(ii) an alternative arrangement between the department and the person who is ordered to pay contributions.

(c) A finding of good cause not to require immediate income withholding must, at a minimum, be based upon:

(i) a written determination and explanation by the court of the reasons why the implementation of immediate income withholding is not in the best interests of the child; and

(ii) proof of timely payment of previously ordered support in cases involving modification of contributions ordered under this section.

(d) An alternative arrangement must:

(i) provide sufficient security to ensure compliance with the arrangement;

(ii) be in writing and be signed by a representative of the department and the person required to make contributions; and

(iii) if approved by the court, be entered into the record of the proceeding.

(7) (a) If the court orders the payment of contributions under this section, the department shall apply to the department of public health and human services for support enforcement services pursuant to Title IV-D of the Social Security Act.

(b) The department of public health and human services may collect and enforce a contribution order under this section by any means available under law, including the remedies provided for in Title 40, chapter 5, parts 2 and 4"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1997.

The amendments to this section made by sec. 24, Ch. 286, L. 1997, were rendered void by sec. 49(3)(e), Ch. 286, L. 1997, a coordination section.

Saving Clause: Section 79, Ch. 550, L. 1997, was a saving clause.

Severability: Section 80, Ch. 550, L. 1997, was a severability clause.

1995 Amendments: Chapter 528 in (2)(c) substituted "ability of the parents, legal guardian, or persons contributing to the youth's delinquency or need for supervision to pay" for "ability of the parents or legal guardian to pay"; and made minor changes in style.

Chapter 546 in (5), (7)(a), and (7)(b) substituted "department of public health and human services" for "department of social and rehabilitation services"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1995.

Saving Clause: Section 571, Ch. 546, L. 1995, was a saving clause.

1991 Amendments: Chapter 105 inserted (1)(e) providing for placement of youth under home arrest; and made minor changes in style.

Chapter 696 inserted (4) through (7) regarding determination of the financial ability of parents or guardians to contribute to costs for care, placement, and treatment of a youth and regarding methods of contribution for those costs; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1991.

Severability: Section 14, Ch. 105, L. 1991, was a severability clause.

Applicability: Section 15, Ch. 105, L. 1991, provided: "[This act] applies to sentences imposed after [the effective date of this act] [effective October 1, 1991]."

1987 Amendment: In (1)(b), after "41-3-1102", substituted "and as determined by the department" for "or into a home approved by the court"; at end of (1)(c), after "youth", inserted "as determined by the department"; deleted former (1)(d) that read: "(d) transfer of legal custody to the department of institutions for a period of 6 months, which period may be extended for 6 months upon further order of the court after notice and hearing"; and deleted former (3) that read: "(3) If the court finds that placement in a youth care facility other than a youth group home or youth foster home is necessary and in the best interests of the youth and the community, the court shall determine if the youth can receive appropriate treatment in a youth care facility located in Montana as follows:

(a) If the court finds the youth can receive appropriate treatment in a youth care facility located in Montana that will accept the youth, the court may not place the youth in a youth care facility located outside this state unless an out-of-state facility can provide appropriate treatment that:

(i) can be obtained at a cost less than that offered by any available facility in this state; and

(ii) is available in closer proximity to the youth's place of residence than any facility located in this state.

(b) When the department of social and rehabilitation services is ordered to pay the costs of caring for the child in a youth care facility other than a youth foster home or youth group home, the court shall provide the department with at least 5 days' written notice and opportunity to be heard before ordering the placement of the youth."

1986 Amendment: Deleted in second version language prohibiting commitment of youth in Department custody to youth treatment center unless commitment provisions are followed.

Effective Date: The 1986 amendment will be effective on the date the deed of sale of the Montana Youth Treatment Center from the Board of Land Commissioners is delivered to a buyer. (Deed delivered January 1, 1987.)

Repealer: Section 15, Ch. 14, Sp. L. June 1986, also repeals sections 53-21-164, 53-21-501, 53-21-502, and 53-21-505, effective upon the sale.

1985 Amendment: Inserted (3) allowing court to consider out-of-state placement in youth care facility.

1983 Amendments: Chapter 129 made the following changes: in (1)(d), substituted present language for "transfer of legal custody of the youth to the department of institutions, provided that such commitment does not authorize the department of institutions to place the youth in a state youth correctional facility, and such commitment may not exceed a period of 6 months without a subsequent order of the court, after notice and hearing;" and inserted (3) requiring that a youth in violation of an aftercare agreement be returned to the court for further disposition.

Chapter 363 inserted (4) prohibiting the commitment of a youth in departmental custody to the Montana Youth Treatment Center unless commitment provisions are followed.

Chapter 465 made the following changes: in (1)(b), substituted language after "placement of the youth" for "in a licensed foster home or other home approved by the court"; at end of (1)(c), deleted "including but not limited to a district youth guidance home".

1981 Amendment: Added the provision concerning ability to pay to (2)(e).

Commitment to Correctional Facility Under Consent Adjustment Improper: The Youth Court's commitment of J.F. to Mountain View School, based on violation of probation imposed pursuant to a consent adjustment, was held improper under provision of 41-5-403(4) (renumbered 41-5-1304), which states "No youth may be placed in a state youth correctional facility under informal adjustment". In re J.F., 219 M 140, 710 P2d 705, 42 St. Rep. 1904 (1985).

When Youth Court Without Jurisdiction: When, pursuant to a consent adjustment, J.F. was placed on probation for 6 months and the period of probation was not continued, the Youth Court was without jurisdiction to commit J.F. to Mountain View School upon petition of the County Attorney filed after the 6-month period charging a violation of probation. In re J.F., 219 M 140, 710 P2d 705, 42 St. Rep. 1904 (1985).

Informal Hearing: Sections 10-605 and 10-611, R.C.M. 1947 (since repealed), must be read together, and the informal manner in which a hearing may be conducted as provided in section 10-611 refers to the preliminary inquiry provided for in section 10-605. 1997 Amendments: Chapter 498 inserted (2) allowing County Attorney to designate certain cases as extended jurisdiction juvenile prosecutions and allowing County Attorney to request court to designate other cases as extended jurisdiction juvenile prosecutions; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective May 2, 1997.

Chapter 550 in (1) substituted "to be a delinquent youth or a youth in need of intervention" for "to be a delinquent or in need of supervision"; in (5), inserted "a youth assessment center" and after "place of detention" inserted "assessment"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1997.

Severability: Section 15, Ch. 498, L. 1997, was a severability clause.

Section 80, Ch. 550, L. 1997, was a severability clause.

Applicability: Section 17, Ch. 498, L. 1997, provided: "[This act] applies to all offenses committed on or after [the effective date of this act]." Effective May 2, 1997.

Code Commissioner Change: Section 76, Ch. 550, L. 1997, instructed the Code Commissioner, in the Montana Code Annotated or in legislation enacted by the 1997 Legislature, to change references to youth in need of supervision to references to youth in need of intervention. The change has been made in this section.

Saving Clause: Section 79, Ch. 550, L. 1997, was a saving clause.

Case Notes

Illegal Pretrial Process and Procedure — State's Right to Charge and Try Case: Youth Court petition initiating proceedings did not state the facts constituting the offense youth was charged with in ordinary and concise language so as to enable a person of common understanding to know what was intended. The petition did not include a witness list. An arrest warrant was issued out of the Youth Court, although there is no provision in the Youth Court Act for issuance of an arrest warrant. Presumably the warrant was issued under 46-6-201, but there was no showing of probable cause supported by oath or affirmation reduced to writing. The youth had already been arrested in Oklahoma at the time the warrant was issued. By what process and authority he was arrested in Oklahoma was not shown, nor was it shown he was arrested by a law enforcement officer. He was subsequently transferred to the District Court for trial as an adult and convicted of two counts of deliberate homicide. The Youth Court proceedings from issuance of the warrant for arrest onward were patently defective. However, this did not preclude the state from having him transferred to the District Court, proceeding against him, and obtaining a conviction. St. v. Woods, 203 M 401, 662 P2d 579, 40 St. Rep. 533 (1983).

Substance of Petition: The substance of the petition under section 10-605, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed), must be the facts which bring the child within the provisions of section 10-602, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed). St. v. Johnson, 141 M 1, 374 P2d 504 (1962).

Insufficiency of Petition: The petition in a proceeding under Ch. 122, L. 1911 (now repealed), for the trial of an alleged juvenile delinquent, which failed to make the parents parties or allege that they were unfit guardians or that they had consented to the proceeding, was insufficient. In re Satterthwaite, 52 M 550, 160 P 346 (1916).

Indigent Youth Entitled to Counsel — Reimbursement: When a petition is filed initiating proceedings under the Montana Youth Court Act, a youth is entitled to court-appointed counsel when the youth is indigent and the youth's parents have sufficient financial resources but refuse to employ counsel. 1991 Amendment: Near beginning of (5) substituted "placed in detention or shelter care" for "in shelter care or detained", after "court" deleted "upon petition of the youth, his parents or guardian, or his counsel", and at end substituted "probable cause hearing as provided in 41-5-303" for "hearing in order to determine whether the circumstances of the case require such detention or shelter care and the form the detention or shelter care should take. All mentioned parties shall be notified of such petition process at the time of initial detention or shelter care"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1992.

1987 Amendments: Chapter 475 in (4), before "custody of the youth", inserted "legal".

Chapter 515 at beginning of (4), after "appears", deleted "from any sworn statement presented"; and inserted (6) authorizing Youth Court Judge to admit youth to bail.

Delay of 391 Days Attributable to State — Speedy Trial Analysis Triggered — Remand for Determination of Whether State Can Prove Lack of Prejudice: A.G., a juvenile charged with felony vehicle theft, being a runaway, and curfew violation, moved to dismiss the charges for lack of a speedy trial 2 months before a scheduled hearing. The District Court subsequently attributed 229 of 392 days of delay to the state, concluded that the right to a speedy trial was not violated, and placed the burden on A.G. to show that the delay was prejudicial. Applying the criteria in Billings v. Bruce, 1998 MT 186, 290 M 148, 965 P2d 866 (1998), the Supreme Court found that the District Court incorrectly calculated the length of delay, which was actually 455 days. As established in Billings v. Bruce, any delay over 200 days triggers further speedy trial analysis. Because of a miscommunication between the juvenile probation office and the County Attorney, the state neglected to diligently move the case toward prosecution, and A.G. was under no obligation to ensure diligent prosecution of the case or to help the state avoid dismissal for failure to timely prosecute. Further, the District Court mistakenly placed the burden of proving prejudice on A.G., when in actuality, the burden was on the state to prove a lack of prejudice. The Supreme Court remanded for a hearing to determine whether A.G. was prejudiced by the 455-day delay. In re A.G., 2002 MT 111, 309 M 491, 47 P3d 831 (2002).

Personal Service: Service of the citation on an adult brother of the child's father at the father's home was not sufficient service on the father. In re Allamaras, 139 M 130, 361 P2d 340 (1961), explained in In re Gonzalez, 139 M 592, 366 P2d 718 (1961).

Case Notes

Minor's Prior DUI in City Court Properly Applied to Felony DUI Charge — No Violation of Constitutional Rights in City Court: Allen was arrested for a felony fourth DUI in 2004. Calculation of the number of DUIs included Allen's first arrest in 1997 as a minor, to which Allen pleaded guilty in City Court. Allen contended that it was improper to include the 1997 conviction in the total because that conviction was constitutionally infirm in that the City Court failed to advise him of his rights, including the right to counsel, and accepted his guilty plea without consent of a parent. Allen further contended that as a minor he was incapable of knowingly, voluntarily, and intelligently waiving the right to counsel. The Supreme Court disagreed. City Court records provided direct evidence that Allen's 1997 conviction was not obtained in violation of Allen's constitutional rights, and Allen failed to rebut the presumption of regularity that attached to the 1997 conviction. With specific regard to the right to counsel argument, the court noted that because the Youth Court does not have concurrent jurisdiction with the City Court over traffic violations, including DUIs, Allen was incorrect in claiming that the right to counsel could only have been waived by Allen and a parent at the 1997 proceedings. Therefore, application of Allen's 1997 conviction in calculating a felony DUI was not error. St. v. Allen, 2009 MT 124, 350 M 204, 206 P3d 951 (2009).

Adjudication and Commitment Improper When Youth Not Represented by Counsel: When youth was not represented by legal counsel at all proceedings following the filing of a petition alleging the youth to be in need of supervision (now intervention) and the right to counsel was not waived, adjudication and commitment to Mountain View School was held improper. In re J.F., 219 M 140, 710 P2d 705, 42 St. Rep. 1904 (1985).

Youth — Waiver of Right to Counsel: To be effective, waiver of right to counsel by a youth in Justice's Court must be accompanied by waiver of right to counsel by the parent or guardian of the youth. Edward v. Collings, 193 M 426, 632 P2d 325, 38 St. Rep. 1240 (1981).

County, Not State, Required to Fund Legal Expenses of Indigent Juvenile Under Youth Court Act: Youth Court defense expenses are not included in 3-5-901 as a specific expense that the state is required to fund; thus, the Legislature did not intend the state to be responsible for funding Youth Court expenses. Rather, pursuant to 41-5-104 (now repealed) and 41-5-111, the Board of County Commissioners is required to fund the legal defense expenses of an indigent youth against whom a petition has been filed in Youth Court. (See 2005 amendment.) 48 A.G. Op. 16 (2000).

Indigent Youth Entitled to Counsel — Reimbursement: When a petition is filed initiating proceedings under the Montana Youth Court Act, a youth is entitled to court-appointed counsel when the youth is indigent and the youth's parents have sufficient financial resources but refuse to employ counsel. A Youth Court may order reimbursement from nonindigent parents for expenses associated with court-appointed counsel. (See 2005 amendment.) 42 A.G. Op. 88 (1988).

Requirement of Counsel: This section (formerly 41-5-511) limits the requirement of counsel to those proceedings in which a youth is charged as a delinquent youth because commitment for more than 6 months is possible only as a result of such an adjudication. Because a youth alleged to be in need of supervision (now intervention) cannot be committed for more than 6 months, the requirement of counsel under this section (formerly 41-5-511) does not attach in that situation. Custodial Interrogation of Youth Without Consent — Miranda Warning Required — Suppression of Confession and Withdrawal of Guilty Plea Required: A 14-year-old boy's mother called his school, reported that he had not returned home the previous night, and requested that he be picked up. The school resource officer notified police and asked that the boy be brought to school if found. An officer later found the boy on the street smelling of alcohol and took the boy to the police station where it was discovered that several town businesses had been burglarized during the night, including a bowling alley where money and liquor had been stolen. Although there was no record that the youth was advised of his Miranda rights, during interrogation both prior to and after arrival of his parents, the youth confessed to robbing the bowling alley and subsequently pleaded guilty to felony burglary. The Youth Court summarily determined that the confessions were voluntary, denied a motion to suppress, found the youth was delinquent, and ordered 2 years' probation. On appeal, the Supreme Court addressed the voluntariness of the confessions and reversed. Given the absence of a tangible record that the officer read Miranda rights to the youth or that the youth or the parents consented in writing to a waiver of Miranda rights or agreed to the interview, the requirement in 41-5-331 that a youth be advised of the right against self-incrimination and the right to counsel was violated. Thus, the confessions could not be considered voluntary and should have been suppressed by the Youth Court. The Supreme Court also ordered that on remand, the youth be allowed to withdraw the guilty plea In re Z.M., 2007 MT 122, 337 M 278, 160 P3d 490 (2007).

Youth's Waiver of Rights When Parent and Youth in Separate Places — No Specific Topic of Questioning — Admissibility of Confession: After a fire in a clandestine methamphetamine laboratory, police sought to question a youth who was reported to be involved. With the youth's mother present, the officers informed them of the youth's various rights, gave them a written statement of rights, and allowed them to discuss waiver of the rights. In the youth's presence, the mother signed a consent to waive the youth's rights. The youth was then taken to the station without his mother, who declined to go, was informed of his rights again and signed a waiver of rights, and was questioned about the fire and the laboratory. The youth subsequently confessed to involvement in the drug operation, and the District Court declared him delinquent and entered a dispositional order. On appeal, the youth contended that the confession should have been suppressed because he and his mother did not agree together to waive his rights and because his mother was led to believe that the questioning was about the fire and not the laboratory, so she could not effectively waive his rights without accurate knowledge of the basis of the questioning, citing Evans v. District Court, 2000 MT 38, 298 M 279, 995 P2d 455 (2000). The Supreme Court disagreed. Nothing in Evans or in 41-5-331 requires that a youth and parent agree as to the specific topic of questioning to which a waiver of rights applies in order to make the waiver effective, nor does 41-5-331 require the agreement of the youth and parent in the same place at the same time. The youth also failed to show that the confession was involuntary through police deceit because he should have known that any interview regarding the fire could involve questions regarding the drug operation. In re C.L., 2004 MT 71, 320 M 369, 87 P3d 462 (2004).

Lack of Advisement of Right to Counsel and Right Against Self-Incrimination for Youth Taken Into Custody for Questioning Reversible Error — When Waiver of Rights Attaches: A youth was questioned at the Sheriff's office regarding a burglary and criminal mischief and was then taken home, where he agreed to relinquish articles of clothing that were not inconsistent with evidence found at the crime scene. The youth's parents were not notified of any of the Sheriff's actions, and no omnibus hearing was held. The youth's clothing was later introduced at trial over the youth's objection. Following conviction, the youth appealed, contending that the clothing was not legally obtained pursuant to a search warrant, that he was not advised of his rights, and that he did not give an informed waiver of his right to have his parents contacted prior to relinquishment of the clothing. The state maintained that the youth voluntarily consented to relinquish the clothing and thus waived his rights. The Supreme Court reversed. Under the Montana Youth Court Act, a youth taken into custody for questioning on a matter that could result in allegations that the youth is delinquent must be advised of the right to counsel and the right against self-incrimination, and the youth's parents must be immediately notified by the investigating officer. A youth who is 16 years of age or older may make an effective waiver of those rights. In determining whether waiver and consent by juveniles are voluntary, the Supreme Court applies the totality of circumstances test set out in Evans v. District Court, 2000 MT 38, 298 M 279, 995 P2d 455 (2000), which provides that a determination of voluntariness takes into account: (1) the defendant's age and level of education; (2) whether the defendant was advised of the defendant's rights; (3) the defendant's prior experience with the criminal justice system; (4) the defendant's background and experience; and (5) the defendant's demeanor, coherence, articulateness, and capacity to make full use of the defendant's faculties. Here, the District Court failed to take the Evans factors into account, and the requirements of 41-5-331 regarding parental notification were not fulfilled. Failure to follow statutory requirements and to consider the totality of the circumstances was reversible error. In re C.T.P., 2004 MT 63, 320 M 279, 87 P3d 399 (2004).

Plain Error in Allowing Youth's Extrajudicial Statements When Youth Not Advised of Right to Counsel and Right Against Self-Incrimination: A youth asserted for the first time on appeal that the Youth Court improperly admitted extrajudicial statements that the youth made regarding the youth's whereabouts when a burglary and criminal mischief were committed. Despite the state's contention that the arguments should not be considered because they were not raised at trial, the Supreme Court nevertheless considered the argument under the plain error doctrine because the youth was not notified while in custody of the fundamental right to counsel and the right to avoid self-incrimination, nor were the youth's parents notified as required. The youth's rights under the Montana Youth Court Act and the constitution were simply ignored in this case, so in order to avoid a question of the fundamental fairness of the trial by admission of constitutionally infirm extrajudicial statements, the Supreme Court reversed the trial court's decision to admit the statements. In re C.T.P., 2004 MT 63, 320 M 279, 87 P3d 399 (2004).

Corroboration by Testimony of Children: The testimony of a 5-year-old witness and 6-year-old victim was sufficient to corroborate the out-of-court confession of a 14-year-old boy charged with sexual assault. In re J.W.K., 223 M 1, 724 P2d 164, 43 St. Rep. 1483 (1986).

Case Notes

No Authority of Youth Court to Order Youth to Pay Restitution Past Age of Majority: In 2000, a 12-year-old who admitted sexually assaulting an 8-year-old was adjudicated a delinquent youth by the Youth Court and placed on probation until age 18. Probation conditions included payment of restitution and the costs of the victim's therapy. In 2003, the Youth Court was notified by a restitution officer that a therapist had advised that counseling for the victim and the victim's mother was complete and that the restitution amount owed was $4,507.53; however, no restitution hearing was held. Nevertheless, the state and the youth's parents executed a restitution agreement specifying that the youth was liable for payment of restitution and identifying $4,507.53 as the total restitution due. The Youth Court signed the 2003 agreement, and $4,507.53 was subsequently paid in full. In 2005, the state requested a restitution hearing, noting that the victim's mother had submitted additional restitution claims of $4,352.93 for therapeutic sports activity for the victim and $8,309.25 for university schooling costs for the mother. At a hearing held 2 days before the end of the youth's probation, the Youth Court claimed jurisdiction over the youth for financial purposes until the youth turned 21 and ordered the youth to pay $12,662.18 in additional restitution to cover the mother's claims for sports and school-related costs. The youth appealed on grounds that the Youth Court had no authority to order additional restitution, and the Supreme Court reversed. The Youth Court limited its retention of jurisdiction beyond the youth's 18th birthday to enforcement of financial obligations set forth in the original disposition order and in the 2003 agreement establishing the total restitution to be paid by the youth. Therefore, the Youth Court did not have jurisdiction to impose additional restitution in a stand-alone order after the youth's probation, of which payment of restitution was a condition, expired, and the Supreme Court remanded with instructions to vacate the order for additional restitution. Attorney General's Opinions

Disposition for Probation Violation: A youth originally charged as and adjudicated a youth in need of supervision (now youth in need of intervention) who violates probation cannot be committed to the Department of Institutions (now Department of Corrections) for more than 6 months under this section (formerly 41-5-533) because such disposition was unavailable in the original adjudication. However, a youth originally charged as a delinquent youth who is placed on probation as a youth in need of supervision (now youth in need of intervention) (as provided in 41-5-103(13)(d)) may be committed for more than 6 months if adjudged a delinquent youth after violating probation. 40 A.G. Op. 74 (1984).

Alternative to Revocation Proceeding: As an alternative to a revocation proceeding, a youth in need of supervision (now youth in need of intervention) who violates probation could be charged by petition as a delinquent youth under the definition of a delinquent youth, 41-5-103(12)(b), and could then be committed for a period of more than 6 months. 40 A.G. Part 15
Formal Proceeding — Hearing — Disposition

Part Case Notes

Prejudicial Delay: When petition to adjudicate J.F., a youth in need of supervision (now youth in need of intervention), was filed August 13 and no further action was taken until October 29, the Youth Court erred either in not dismissing the petition with prejudice after 15 days from service of the petition or in not ordering a continuance. In re J.F., 219 M 140, 710 P2d 705, 42 St. Rep. 1904 (1985).

Hearing Mandate — Reasonable Attempt to Comply Required: A petition charging four youths with conspiracy to commit aggravated assault was filed on June 16, and a hearing date was set for June 27. On June 22, an order issued continuing the hearing date until July 6. While it is not apparent from the record whether the state or trial court requested the continuance, it is clear that the youths did not. On July 6, the court ordered the hearing date continued. On August 2, the state asked that a new hearing date be set. Prior to the hearing, the youths moved to dismiss the petition under this section. The trial court dismissed the petition with prejudice, and the state appealed. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed, stating that the first continuance granted for unknown reasons did not meet the "interests of justice" and "due diligence" requirements of 41-5-516(2) (now repealed) and by itself was sufficient for dismissal. The court also stated that even assuming that the trial court had ordered the first two continuances sua sponte (on its own motion), the failure of the state to request a hearing for almost a month after the second order showed a lack of a reasonable attempt to comply with the hearing mandate of 41-5-516(1) (now repealed). In re L.R.T., R.A.C., T.P.V., & M.L.B., 209 M 421, 680 P2d 579, 41 St. Rep. 800 (1984).

Transfer to District Court — Hearing on Youth Court Petition Against Youth Unnecessary: The provision in 41-5-516 (now repealed) that a petition alleging delinquency or need of supervision (now intervention) shall be dismissed with prejudice if a hearing on the petition is not begun within 15 days after service does not apply when the charges are subject to transfer to the District Court and a timely motion to transfer is made. St. v. Woods, 203 M 401, 662 P2d 579, 40 St. Rep. 533 (1983).

Delinquent Youth Conviction Reversal — Inadmissible Hearsay Prejudice — Corroboration of Testimony of Others Responsible or Legally Accountable for Same Offense: After a minor was cited for running a red light and for driving without a license, the County Attorney charged he was a delinquent youth under the Youth Court Act, alleging the minor had taken the car he was found driving without the owner's consent. The minor appealed that the testimony of two police officers concerning the stolen property report was inadmissible hearsay and that his conviction declaring him a delinquent youth was improperly based on the testimony of other individuals who were legally accountable for the offense. The Montana Supreme Court found that the officers' testimony was inadmissible hearsay. The court also found that the corroborating evidence supplied by the officer who stopped the vehicle the minor was driving tended to connect the youth directly with the offense and therefore that the testimony of other minors responsible or legally accountable for the same offense was properly admitted. Despite the fact that the testimony of the other youths in the car, in conjunction with the independent corroborating evidence, could support a conviction in some cases, the reviewing court reversed the conviction. They found that the admission of the hearsay so affected the substantial rights of the accused as to require reversal. In re D.W.L., A Youth, 189 M 267, 615 P2d 887 (1980).

Due Process Required: Statutes regarding juvenile delinquency proceedings contemplate that the formalities of proceedings required by due process be granted and complied with before commitment to the State Industrial School (now Pine Hills Youth Correctional Facility). Proper service and a hearing with representation by counsel, if desired, were not granted in this case, so that commitment was improper. In re Allamaras, 139 M 130, 361 P2d 340 (1961).

Case Notes

Consideration of Juvenile's Prior Offenses Proper in Ordering Psychosexual Evaluation Under Youth Court Act: The Youth Court considered a juvenile's prior record in ordering a psychosexual evaluation prior to disposition. On appeal, the youth contended that under St. v. Ommundson, 1999 MT 16, 293 M 133, 974 P2d 620 (1999), consideration of the prior offenses was error because the prior charges were unrelated to the charges in question. The Supreme Court distinguished Ommundson, a criminal matter, from the present case that was brought under the Montana Youth Court Act and held that Ommundson did not bar the Youth Court from ordering a psychosexual evaluation of the youth that was essential to the youth's appropriate placement. State ex rel. D.M.B. v. District Court, 2004 MT 335, 324 M 190, 103 P3d 514 (2004).

Predispositional Psychosexual Evaluation Without Youth's Consent Authorized Only as Part of Court Disposition — Consideration of Prior Youth Court Offenses Allowed: The Youth Court, over a youth's objection, ordered a psychosexual evaluation for the youth. The specific language of this section controlled over the more general provisions of 41-5-1511. The Supreme Court held that under this section, youths must waive their constitutional rights in order to be subjected to a predispositional medical or psychological evaluation. Thus, the District Court erred in ordering a predispositional psychosexual evaluation over the youth's objection. However, the challenged evaluation was essential to the youth's appropriate placement and to the purposes of the Montana Youth Court Act, so the Supreme Court affirmed. State ex rel. D.M.B. v. District Court, 2004 MT 335, 324 M 190, 103 P3d 514 (2004).

(b) ability of the youth to pay;

(c) ability of the parents, legal guardian, or those that contributed to the youth's delinquency or need for supervision to pay;

(d) amount of damage to the victim; and

(e) legal remedies of the victim. However, the ability of the victim or the victim's insurer to stand any loss may not be considered in any case."

Chapter 550 throughout section substituted references to youth assessment or predisposition report for references to social summary or predisposition report; in (1), in first sentence, substituted "youth in need of intervention" for "youth in need of supervision" and in second sentence inserted reference to cost of adjudication, disposition, and supervision and at end substituted "as required in 41-5-1525, including the costs of necessary medical, dental, and other health care" for "as required in 41-5-523"; in (2), in first sentence after "probation officer", inserted "or an assessment officer" and at end inserted "including a statement by the victim or the victim's family"; in (4), in first sentence, substituted "41-5-521(5) through (7)" (renumbered 41-5-1502(5) through (7)) for "subsections (3), (4), and (5) of 41-5-521" and in second sentence inserted "the victim"; in (5) inserted "or the public"; deleted (6) that read: "(6) In determining whether restitution, as authorized by 41-5-523, is appropriate in a particular case, the following factors may be considered in addition to any other evidence:

(a) age of the youth;

(b) ability of the youth to pay;

(c) ability of the parents, legal guardian, or those that contributed to the youth's delinquency or need for supervision to pay;

(d) amount of damage to the victim; and

(e) legal remedies of the victim. However, the ability of the victim or the victim's insurer to stand any loss may not be considered in any case"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1997.

Saving Clause: Section 50, Ch. 286, L. 1997, was a saving clause.

Section 79, Ch. 550, L. 1997, was a saving clause.

Applicability: Section 51, Ch. 286, L. 1997, provided: "[This act] applies to proceedings commenced after [the effective date of this act]." Effective October 1, 1997.

Severability: Section 80, Ch. 550, L. 1997, was a severability clause.

1995 Amendment: Chapter 528 in (6)(c) substituted "ability of the parents, legal guardian, or those that contributed to the youth's delinquency or need for supervision to pay" for "ability of the parents or legal guardian to pay"; and made minor changes in style.

1991 Amendment: At end of (1) substituted "ability of the youth's parents or guardians to pay a contribution for the cost of care, commitment, and treatment of the youth as required in 41-5-523" for "liability as provided in 41-3-1123 and 41-3-1124"; and made minor change in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1991.

1987 Amendments: Chapter 515 in third sentence of (2), after "guardian", deleted "who gives his consent and".

Chapters 515 and 609 in (6) deleted reference to subsection (1)(f) of 41-5-523.

1983 Amendment: In (1), changed "41-5-805" to "41-3-1123" and "41-5-806" to "41-3-1124".

1981 Amendment: Added the provision concerning ability to stand any loss to (6)(e).

Case Notes

Consideration of Juvenile's Prior Offenses Proper in Ordering Psychosexual Evaluation Under Youth Court Act: The Youth Court considered a juvenile's prior record in ordering a psychosexual evaluation prior to disposition. On appeal, the youth contended that under St. v. Ommundson, 1999 MT 16, 293 M 133, 974 P2d 620 (1999), consideration of the prior offenses was error because the prior charges were unrelated to the charges in question. The Supreme Court distinguished Ommundson, a criminal matter, from the present case that was brought under the Montana Youth Court Act and held that Ommundson did not bar the Youth Court from ordering a psychosexual evaluation of the youth that was essential to the youth's appropriate placement. State ex rel. D.M.B. v. District Court, 2004 MT 335, 324 M 190, 103 P3d 514 (2004).

Predispositional Psychosexual Evaluation Without Youth's Consent Authorized Only as Part of Court Disposition — Consideration of Prior Youth Court Offenses Allowed: The Youth Court, over a youth's objection, ordered a psychosexual evaluation for the youth. The specific language of 41-5-1503 controlled over the more general provisions of this section. The Supreme Court held that under 41-5-1503, youths must waive their constitutional rights in order to be subjected to a predispositional medical or psychological evaluation. Thus, the District Court erred in ordering a predispositional psychosexual evaluation over the youth's objection. However, the challenged evaluation was essential to the youth's appropriate placement and to the purposes of the Montana Youth Court Act, so the Supreme Court affirmed. State ex rel. D.M.B. v. District Court, 2004 MT 335, 324 M 190, 103 P3d 514 (2004).

Record Mandatory:

When the record does not indicate any attempt by the Youth Court to comply with the adjudicatory hearing or dispositional hearing provisions of 41-5-521 and 41-5-522 (renumbered 41-5-1502 and 41-5-1511), the proceedings were not sufficient under the Youth Court Act to constitute a proper adjudication that J.F. was a youth in need of supervision (now youth in need of intervention). In re J.F., 219 M 140, 710 P2d 705, 42 St. Rep. 1904 (1985).

The absence of a verbatim record of a dispositional hearing requires reversal. Otherwise, appeal would become an illusory right without substance. In re Geary, 172 M 204, 562 P2d 821 (1977).

Transfer of Youth From Treatment Facility to Department: Given the Youth Court's power under 41-5-523 (renumbered 41-5-1512) to place a youth in the custody of the Department of Institutions (now Department of Corrections) and in a youth care facility, the court's order that the youth be transferred automatically from a treatment center to the custody of the Department of Institutions (now Department of Corrections) was a proper disposition. The Youth Court held a dispositional hearing and issued an order directing that temporary custody of the youth be placed in the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Corrections) for treatment. The court is not required to hold another hearing before the youth is placed in the custody of the Department of Institutions (now Department of Corrections). St. v. Twoteeth, 219 M 101, 711 P2d 789, 42 St. Rep. 1873 (1985).

Dispositional Order to Be Supported by Findings: A youth admitted the commission of a burglary, and the evidence strongly supported his admission. The Youth Court ordered that the youth be committed to the Department of Institutions (now Department of Corrections) but did not enter findings of fact supporting its order of commitment. The Supreme Court remanded to the Youth Court for entry of findings. In re V.R.B., 201 M 127, 653 P2d 133, 39 St. Rep. 2001 (1982).

Dispositional Stage — Fitness of Parents: At the dispositional stage the concern for the best interests of the youth and community is paramount. The court need not, therefore, make specific findings as to the fitness of the parents. In re Geary, 172 M 204, 562 P2d 821 (1977).

Due Process: Even though a hearing may be informal, the requirements of due process must be met; where there was no sworn testimony, no proof, no representation by counsel, no proper citation to the parent, and no hearing in fact, an order of commitment to the State Industrial School (now Pine Hills Youth Correctional Facility) was reversible. In re Allamaras, 139 M 130, 361 P2d 340 (1961), explained in In re Gonzalez, 139 M 592, 366 P2d 718 (1961).

Informal Hearing:

Sections 10-605 and 10-611, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed), had to be read together, and the informal manner in which a hearing could be conducted as provided in section 10-611 referred to the preliminary inquiry provided for in section 10-605. In re Gonzalez, 139 M 592, 366 P2d 718 (1961).

An informal trial is improper when the hearing is upon a petition of County Attorney charging a minor child, 16 years of age, with being a delinquent child, which could result in commitment. In re Gonzalez, 139 M 592, 366 P2d 718 (1961).

Stenographic Record of Evidence: Proceeding upon a petition of County Attorney charging minor with being a delinquent child, resulting in commitment of child to the State Industrial School (now Pine Hills Youth Correctional Facility), was remanded to District Court where no stenographic record had been made of the evidence presented in the juvenile court. In re Gonzalez, 139 M 592, 366 P2d 718 (1961).

Application of Section: The prohibition in section 10-611, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed), which prohibited the "disposition of a delinquent child or evidence given in the court" from being used as evidence in any other case or proceeding against the child, applies only where the child is a party in a later proceeding; where the child is a witness in a later case, evidence of contradictory statements made in the juvenile court may be used for the purpose of impeachment. St. v. Searle, 125 M 467, 239 P2d 995 (1952).

41-5-1512. Disposition of youth in need of intervention or youth who violate consent adjustments.

Compiler's Comments

2009 Amendment: Chapter 2 in (1)(l) in five places before reference to probation officer inserted "juvenile". Amendment effective October 1, 2009.

2007 Amendment: Chapter 398 in (1)(c) in first sentence substituted "youth court for the purposes of placement in a private, out-of-home facility" for "department in jurisdictions that do not participate in the juvenile delinquency intervention program or to the youth court in jurisdictions that participate in the juvenile delinquency intervention program for the purposes of funding a private, out-of-home, residential placement" and in second sentence before "the youth court" deleted "the department or to"; in (1)(o)(ii) at end of first sentence deleted "at the county's expense, which is not reimbursable under part 19 of this chapter" and inserted second sentence concerning court payment from its allocation; in (2) in second sentence after "may" inserted "not"; in (3) near middle substituted "annual allocation" for "account"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective June 30, 2007.

2001 Amendment: Chapter 587 in (1)(b) deleted former third sentence that read: "The judge may not place the youth in a residence unless the department informs the judge that resources are available for placement of the youth at that residence"; in (1)(c) in first sentence after "department" inserted "in jurisdictions that do not participate in the juvenile delinquency intervention program or to the youth court in jurisdictions that participate in the juvenile delinquency intervention program" and in second sentence after "department" inserted "or to the youth court"; in (1)(i) after "community" deleted "and that does not obligate funding from the department for services outside the state of Montana without the department's approval, except that a youth may not be placed by a youth court in a residential treatment facility as defined in 50-5-101. Only the department may, pursuant to subsection (3) of this section, place a youth in a residential treatment facility"; inserted (2) prohibiting court from ordering local government entity to pay for care, treatment, intervention, or placement, but allowing order for local government entity to pay for evaluation and in-state transportation of youth; inserted (3) prohibiting court from ordering state government entity from paying for care, treatment, intervention, placement, or evaluation that results in account deficit for district without cost containment review panel approval; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 2001.

Retroactive Applicability: Section 1, Ch. 152, L. 2001, amended sec. 18, Ch. 375, L. 1997, to read: "Section 18. Retroactive applicability. The provisions of Title 46, chapter 23, part 5, and of [this act] relating to registration apply retroactively, within the meaning of 1-2-109, to:

(1) sexual offenders who are sentenced by a state or federal court in any state on or after July 1, 1989, or who as a result of a sentence are under the supervision of a county, state, or federal agency in any state on or after July 1, 1989; and

(2) violent offenders who are sentenced by a state or federal court in any state on or after October 1, 1995, or who as a result of a sentence are under the supervision of a county, state, or federal agency in any state on or after October 1, 1995." Amendment effective March 29, 2001.

Severability: Section 24, Ch. 587, L. 2001, was a severability clause.

Intervention in Delinquency Pilot Program: Section 1, Ch. 161, L. 1999, amended sec. 73, Ch. 505, L. 1997, by extending the pilot program for 2 years, authorizing the department of corrections to create up to 10 additional accounts for judicial districts, and requiring the department to present a proposal to the 57th legislature. Section 1, Ch. 161, L. 1999, was not codified because of its temporary nature. Amendment effective March 24, 1999.

Extension of Termination Date: Section 2, Ch. 161, L. 1999, amended sec. 82, Ch. 550, L. 1997, by extending the termination date for the pilot program imposed by Ch. 550 to December 31, 2000. Effective March 24, 1999.

Retroactive Applicability: Section 4, Ch. 161, L. 1999, provided: "[This act] applies retroactively, within the meaning of 1-2-109, to all occurrences after January 1, 1999."

1997 Amendments: Chapter 185 inserted (12) allowing confiscation of a youth's driver's license; in (2)(c), after "execution of", substituted "sentences" for "sentence" (voided by Ch. 550 amendments); and made minor changes in style.

Chapter 375 in (1)(d), after "register as a", substituted "sexual or violent offender under 46-23-504" for "sex offender pursuant to 46-18-254 and 46-23-506" (voided by Ch. 550 amendment).

Chapter 550 in introduction substituted "If a youth is found to be a youth in need of intervention or to have violated a consent adjustment" for "If a youth is found to be a delinquent youth or a youth in need of supervision"; deleted (1)(a) that read: "(a) retain jurisdiction in a disposition provided under subsection (1)(b) or (1)(d)"; in (1) inserted "The youth court shall retain jurisdiction in a disposition under this subsection"; deleted (1)(c) and (1)(d) that read: "(c) subject to subsections (1)(n)(i), (2)(a), (2)(b), and (6), sentence a youth to one of the state youth correctional facilities established under 52-5-101 and, as part of the sentence, deny the youth eligibility for release without the express approval of the sentencing judge until the youth reaches 18 years of age. A youth may not be sentenced to a state youth correctional facility unless the department informs the judge that space is available for the youth at that facility. The sentencing judge may not place limitations on the release unless recommended by the youth placement committee.

(d) require a youth found to be delinquent to register as a sex offender pursuant to 46-18-254 and 46-23-506"; in (2), in first and third sentences, substituted "place the youth in a residence" for "place the youth in an in-state residence"; in (3), in first sentence, inserted "for the purposes of funding a private, out-of-home, residential placement subject to the conditions in 41-5-1522"; deleted (1)(f)(ii) that read: "(ii) in the case of a delinquent youth who is determined by the court to be a serious juvenile offender, the judge may specify that the youth be placed in a state youth correctional facility if the judge finds that the placement is necessary for the protection of the public. The court may order the department to notify the court within 5 working days before the proposed release of a youth from a youth correctional facility. Once a youth is committed to the department for placement in a state youth correctional facility, the department is responsible for determining an appropriate date of release into an appropriate placement"; in (4) substituted "order restitution for damages that result from the offense for which the youth is disposed by the youth or by the person that contributed to the delinquency of the youth" for "order restitution by the youth or the youth's parents"; deleted (1)(h) that read: "(h) impose a fine as authorized by law if the violation alleged would constitute a criminal offense if committed by an adult"; in (9), in last sentence, substituted "subsection (3) of this section" for "subsection (1)(f)"; in (10), at beginning, inserted "subject to the provisions of 41-5-1504" and substituted "finds that the youth is found to be suffering from a mental disorder, as defined in 53-21-102, and who meets the criteria in 53-21-126(1)" for "finds that the youth is seriously mentally ill as defined in 53-21-102" and deleted second sentence that read: "The youth is entitled to all rights provided by 53-21-114 through 53-21-119"; deleted (1)(n)(i) and (1)(n)(ii) that read: "(i) A youth adjudicated mentally ill or seriously mentally ill as defined in 53-21-102 may not be committed or sentenced to a state youth correctional facility.

(ii) A youth adjudicated to be mentally ill or seriously mentally ill after placement in or sentencing to a state youth correctional facility must be moved to a more appropriate placement in response to the youth's mental health needs and consistent with the disposition alternatives available in 53-21-127"; deleted former (2) through (14) that read: "(2) When a youth is committed to the department, the department shall determine the appropriate placement and rehabilitation program for the youth after considering the recommendations made under 41-5-527 by the youth placement committee. Placement is subject to the following limitations:

(a) A youth in need of supervision or adjudicated delinquent for commission of an act that would not be a criminal offense if committed by an adult may not be placed in a state youth correctional facility.

(b) A youth may not be held in a state youth correctional facility for a period of time in excess of the maximum period of imprisonment that could be imposed on an adult convicted of the offense or offenses that brought the youth under the jurisdiction of the youth court. This section does not limit the power of the department to enter into an aftercare agreement with the youth pursuant to 52-5-126.

(c) A youth may not be placed in or transferred to a penal institution or other facility used for the execution of sentence of adults convicted of crimes.

(3) A youth placed in a state youth correctional facility or other facility or program operated by the department or who signs an aftercare agreement under 52-5-126 must be supervised by the department. A youth who is placed in any other placement by the department, the youth court, or the youth court's juvenile probation officer must be supervised by the probation officer of the youth court having jurisdiction over the youth under 41-5-205 whether or not the youth is committed to the department. Supervision by the youth probation officer includes but is not limited to:

(a) submitting information and documentation necessary for the person, committee, or team that is making the placement recommendation to determine an appropriate placement for the youth;

(b) securing approval for payment of special education costs from the youth's school district of residence or the office of public instruction, as required in Title 20, chapter 7, part 4;

(c) submitting an application to a facility in which the youth may be placed; and

(d) case management of the youth.

(4) The youth court may order a youth to receive a medical or psychological evaluation at any time prior to final disposition if the youth waives the youth's constitutional rights in the manner provided for in 41-5-303. The county determined by the court as the residence of the youth is responsible for the cost of the evaluation, except as provided in subsection (5). A county may contract with the department or other public or private agencies to obtain evaluation services ordered by the court.

(5) The youth court shall determine the financial ability of the youth's parents to pay the cost of an evaluation ordered by the court under subsection (4). If they are financially able, the court shall order the youth's parents to pay all or part of the cost of the evaluation.

(6) The youth court may not order placement or evaluation of a youth at a state youth correctional facility unless the youth is found to be a delinquent youth or is alleged to have committed an offense that is transferable to criminal court under 41-5-206.

(7) An evaluation of a youth may not be performed at the Montana state hospital unless the youth is transferred to the district court under 41-5-206, 41-5-208, or 41-5-1105.

(8) An order of the court may be modified at any time. In the case of a youth committed to the department, an order pertaining to the youth may be modified only upon notice to the department and subsequent hearing.

(9) Whenever the court commits a youth to the department, it shall transmit with the dispositional judgment copies of medical reports, social history material, education records, and any other clinical, predisposition, or other reports and information pertinent to the care and treatment of the youth.

(10) If a youth is committed to the department, the court shall examine the financial ability of the youth's parents or guardians to pay a contribution covering all or part of the costs for the care, commitment, and treatment of the youth, including the costs of necessary medical, dental, and other health care.

(11) If the court determines that the youth's parents or guardians are financially able to pay a contribution as provided in subsection (10), the court shall order the youth's parents or guardians to pay an amount based on the uniform child support guidelines adopted by the department of public health and human services pursuant to 40-5-209.

(12) (a) Except as provided in subsection (12)(b), contributions ordered under this section and each modification of an existing order are enforceable by immediate or delinquency income withholding, or both, under Title 40, chapter 5, part 4. An order for contribution that is inconsistent with this section is nevertheless subject to withholding for the payment of the contribution without need for an amendment of the support order or for any further action by the court.

(b) A court-ordered exception from contributions under this section must be in writing and be included in the order. An exception from the immediate income withholding requirement may be granted if the court finds there is:

(i) good cause not to require immediate income withholding; or

(ii) an alternative arrangement between the department and the person who is ordered to pay contributions.

(c) A finding of good cause not to require immediate income withholding must, at a minimum, be based upon:

(i) a written determination and explanation by the court of the reasons why the implementation of immediate income withholding is not in the best interests of the youth; and

(ii) proof of timely payment of previously ordered support in cases involving modification of contributions ordered under this section.

(d) An alternative arrangement must:

(i) provide sufficient security to ensure compliance with the arrangement;

(ii) be in writing and be signed by a representative of the department and the person required to make contributions; and

(iii) if approved by the court, be entered into the record of the proceeding.

(13) Upon a showing of a change in the financial ability of the youth's parents or guardians to pay, the court may modify its order for the payment of contributions required under subsection (11).

(14) (a) If the court orders the payment of contributions under this section, the department shall apply to the department of public health and human services for support enforcement services pursuant to Title IV-D of the Social Security Act.

(b) The department of public health and human services may collect and enforce a contribution order under this section by any means available under law, including the remedies provided for in Title 40, chapter 5, parts 2 and 4"; inserted (13) allowing contribution for costs; inserted (14) allowing contribution for victim's counseling costs; inserted (15) allowing deferment of sentence during placement evaluation; inserted (16) allowing placement in youth assessment center; inserted (17) allowing participation in mediation; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1997.

The amendments to this section made by sec. 28, Ch. 286, L. 1997, were rendered void by sec. 49(3)(e), Ch. 286, L. 1997, a coordination section.

The amendments to this section made by sec. 11, Ch. 490, L. 1997, were rendered void by sec. 78(1), Ch. 550, L. 1997, a coordination section.

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 375, L. 1997, provided: "WHEREAS, the Legislature finds that the danger of recidivism posed by sexual and violent offenders and the protection of the public from these offenders is of paramount concern to government and the people; and

WHEREAS, the Legislature further finds that law enforcement agencies' efforts to protect their communities, conduct investigations, and apprehend sexual and violent offenders is impaired by the lack of information about offenders who live within their jurisdictions; and

WHEREAS, the system of registering sexual and violent offenders provides law enforcement with information critical to preventing victimization and to resolving incidents of sexual or violent offenses promptly, including notification of the public when necessary to the continued protection of the community; and

WHEREAS, persons who have committed a sexual or violent offense have a reduced expectation of privacy because of the public's interest in safety; and

WHEREAS, the Legislature finds that releasing information about sexual or violent offenders to law enforcement agencies and, under certain circumstances, providing access to limited information about certain sexual offenders to the general public will further the primary governmental interest of protecting specific vulnerable groups and the public in general from potential harm.

THEREFORE, it is the policy of the State of Montana to assist local law enforcement agencies' efforts in protecting their communities by requiring that sexual or violent offenders register and to authorize the release of necessary and relevant information about sex offenders to the public."

1997 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 375, L. 1997, provided: "A statement of intent is required for this bill in order to provide guidance for rules adopted under [section 12] [46-23-509] concerning the qualifications of sexual offender evaluators and concerning evaluations of sexual offenders. The legislature intends that sexual offender evaluators possess education and experience similar to the education and experience requirements of therapists certified by the Montana sex offender treatment association. The legislature further intends that rules for evaluating the risk of repeat offenses by sexual offenders include the following factors:

(1) whether the sexual offender has a mental abnormality;
(2) whether the sexual offender's conduct is repetitive and compulsive;
(3) whether drugs or alcohol played a part in the offense or offenses;
(4) whether the sexual offender served the maximum term for the offense or offenses;
(5) whether the offense or offenses involved a child;
(6) the age of the sexual offender at the commission of the offense or offenses;
(7) the relationship between the sexual offender and the victim or victims;
(8) whether the offense or offenses involved use of a weapon;
(9) the number, date, and nature of prior offenses;
(10) conditions of release that minimize risk of another offense, including whether the sexual offender is under supervision or receiving counseling and treatment;
(11) physical conditions that minimize the risk of another offense, such as advanced age or debilitating illness of the sexual offender;
(12) whether psychological or psychiatric profiles of the sexual offender indicate a risk of recidivism;
(13) the sexual offender's response to and participation in treatment;
(14) recent behavior of the sexual offender;
(15) recent threats or gestures by the sexual offender against persons; and
(16) a review of any victim impact statements."

Applicability: Section 18, Ch. 375, L. 1997, provided: "The provisions of [this act] relating to registration apply to:

(1) sexual offenders who are sentenced or who are in the custody or under the supervision of the department of corrections on or after July 1, 1989; and
(2) violent offenders who are sentenced or who are in the custody or under the supervision of the department of corrections on or after October 1, 1995."

Intervention in Delinquency Pilot Program: Section 73, Ch. 505, L. 1997, was not codified in the MCA because of its temporary nature. Under this section, the Department of Corrections is to gather information regarding the placement of youthful offenders and present a proposal to the 56th Legislature.

Saving Clause: Section 79, Ch. 550, L. 1997, was a saving clause.

Severability: Section 80, Ch. 550, L. 1997, was a severability clause.

1995 Amendments: Chapter 438 in (1), after "making", substituted "one or more" for "any"; inserted (1)(a) authorizing Youth Court to retain jurisdiction in disposition provided under subsection (1)(b) or (1)(d); inserted (1)(c) authorizing Youth Court, subject to certain conditions, to sentence youth to state youth correctional facility and to deny eligibility for release without approval of sentencing judge until age 18, prohibiting sentencing of youth to facility unless space is available, and prohibiting limits on release unless recommended by youth placement committee; inserted (1)(d) authorizing Youth Court to require delinquent youth to register as sex offender; inserted (1)(e) authorizing Youth Court to place youth in in-state residence for accountability, rehabilitation, and public protection; in (1)(f), after "department", substituted "In an order committing a youth to the department" for "if the court determines that the youth is in need of placement in other than the youth's own home, provided that"; in (1)(f)(i), before "home", inserted "youth's own" and deleted last sentence that read: "The court shall include a determination in the order committing the youth to the department"; in (1)(m), after "department", inserted "for services outside the state of Montana"; in (1)(n)(i), after "committed", inserted "or sentenced"; in (1)(n)(ii), after "placement", deleted "by the department" and after "in" inserted "or sentencing to"; at beginning of (3), after "placed", deleted "by the department"; at end of (7) inserted references to 41-5-208 and 41-5-1105; adjusted subsection references; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 14, 1995.

Chapter 546 in (11), (14)(a), and (14)(b) substituted "department of public health and human services" for "department of social and rehabilitation services"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1995.

Saving Clause: Section 571, Ch. 546, L. 1995, was a saving clause.

1993 Amendment: Chapter 358 at beginning of (1)(b)(i) deleted "in the case of a youth in need of supervision"; inserted second and third sentences of (1)(b)(ii) regarding notification of court of potential release date and clarifying Department's responsibility for determining appropriate release date; in (1)(j) substituted third and fourth sentences regarding placement of mentally ill youths for former third sentence that read: "Upon release or discharge from the mental health facility, the youth must be returned to the court for further disposition in accordance with this section unless the court order has expired or the court no longer retains jurisdiction under 41-5-205"; in (2)(a), after "supervision", inserted "or adjudicated delinquent for commission of an act that would not be a criminal offense if committed by an adult"; in first sentence of (3), after "facility", inserted "or other facility or program operated by the department or who signs an aftercare agreement under 52-2-126" and in second sentence, after "placement", inserted "by the department, the youth court, or the youth court's juvenile probation officer" and near end inserted "under 41-5-205"; in (9) substituted "medical reports, social history material, education records" for "a medical report"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 16, 1993.

1991 Amendments: Chapter 105 inserted (1)(k) providing for placing youth under home arrest; and made minor changes in style.

Chapter 201 in (1)(a)(ii) (in (1)(b)(ii) of version effective July 1, 1992), (2)(a), (2)(b), and first sentence of (3), before "youth correctional facility", inserted "state"; at end of second sentence of (3) inserted "whether or not the youth is committed to the department"; and inserted (3)(a) through (3)(d) establishing criteria for supervision by a youth probation officer. Amendment effective July 1, 1991.

Chapter 511 throughout section, before "youth correctional facility", inserted "state"; in (4) deleted former first sentence that read: "At any time after the youth has been taken into custody and before final disposition, the court may, with the consent of the youth in the manner provided in 41-5-303 for consent by a youth to a waiver of his constitutional rights or after the youth has been adjudicated delinquent or in need of supervision, order the youth to be evaluated for a period not to exceed 45 days", inserted first sentence relating to medical or psychological evaluation after waiver of rights, in second sentence substituted "The county determined by the court as the residence of the youth is responsible" for "The county commissioners are responsible" and at end inserted exception clause, and at beginning of third sentence inserted "A county" and at end, after "services", inserted "ordered by the court"; inserted (5) relating to payment of evaluation costs by youth's parents; inserted (6) relating to restriction of placement or evaluation of predispositional youth at state youth correctional facility; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1992.

Chapter 696 in (1)(b)(ii), (2)(a), and (2)(b), before "youth correctional facility", inserted "state"; inserted (8) through (12) ((10) through (14) in version effective July 1, 1992) regarding determination of the financial ability of parents or guardians to contribute to costs for care, commitment, and treatment of a youth and regarding methods of contribution for those costs; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1991.

Severability: Section 14, Ch. 105, L. 1991, was a severability clause.

Applicability: Section 15, Ch. 105, L. 1991, provided: "[This act] applies to sentences imposed after [the effective date of this act] [effective October 1, 1991]."

1989 Amendments: Chapter 172 in (1)(b) substituted language authorizing Youth Court to commit youth to Department upon court determination for former language requiring Department, after commitment of youth and consideration of committee recommendations, to determine appropriate placement, supervision, and rehabilitation; in (1)(b)(i), after "supervision", deleted language prohibiting placement of youth in state youth correctional facility and in two places substituted "youth" for "child"; in (1)(b)(ii), after "who is", inserted "determined by the court to be", after "placed in" substituted "a youth correctional facility" for "physical confinement in an appropriate facility only", and after "such" substituted "placement" for "confinement"; deleted (1)(b)(iii) prohibiting court from holding youth in confinement longer than sentence imposed on convicted adult; deleted (1)(b)(iv) referring to disposition of youth under supervision of probation officer; deleted (1)(c) concerning Departmental approval for further youth care, treatment, or evaluation; in (1)(i) inserted language authorizing court to order further care, treatment, evaluation, or relief funded upon Departmental approval; in (2) inserted introductory clause requiring Department to determine placement and rehabilitation program for youth committed to Department; inserted (2)(a) through (2)(c) establishing limitation on youth placement; inserted (3) requiring Departmental supervision upon placement; deleted former (4) prohibiting commitment or transfer of youth to penal institution or adult facility; in (7), after "court", substituted "commits a youth to the" for "vests legal custody in an agency, institution, or"; and deleted former (7) describing form for order of commitment to Department. Amendment effective March 20, 1989.

Chapter 210 inserted (1)(j) relating to committing the youth to a mental health facility. Amendment effective July 1, 1989.

Chapter 434 in (4), near beginning after "custody", inserted "and before final disposition", near end of first sentence, after "evaluated", deleted "by the department", and substituted last sentence relating to County Commissioners' responsibility for cost of evaluation and authority to contract for services for "The department shall determine the place and manner of evaluation." Amendment effective July 1, 1991.

Chapter 616 in former (1)(c) (deleted by Ch. 172 but substantively identical to codified part of subsection (1)(i)), at end of first sentence, inserted exception clause providing that youth may not be placed in residential treatment facility by Youth Court but only by Department. Amendment effective July 1, 1989.

1987 Amendments — Composite Section: Chapter 370 in (2), before "waiver", inserted "a".

Chapter 515 in (1) changed "court" to "youth court"; deleted former (1)(e) that read: "(e) such further care and treatment or evaluation that the court considers beneficial to the youth"; in (1)(d), after "youth", inserted "or his parents"; and inserted (1)(e) through (1)(j) relating to disposition of delinquent youth or youth in need of supervision.

Chapter 609 throughout section substituted references to Department of Family Services (Department now defined as Department of Corrections) for references to Department of Institutions; in (1), after "making", inserted "any of"; deleted former (1)(b) and (1)(c) that read: "(b) place the youth for substitute care into a youth care facility as defined in 41-3-1102 or a home approved by the court;

(c) place the youth in a private agency responsible for the care and rehabilitation of such a youth"; in (1)(b) substituted present language, regarding commitment of youth to Department for determination of appropriate placement, supervision, and rehabilitation program, for former text that read: "transfer legal custody to the department of institutions provided, however, that"; in first sentence of (1)(b)(i), after "such", substituted "commitment" for "transfer of custody", after "facility" deleted remainder of sentence that read: "and such custody may not continue for a period of more than 6 months without a subsequent court order after notice and hearing", and inserted last two sentences requiring court to determine whether continuation in home is contrary to best interest of child; inserted (1)(b)(ii) through (1)(b)(iv) placing conditions on Department's treatment of youth committed to Department; at beginning of (1)(c) inserted "order" and after "evaluation" substituted "that does not obligate funding from the department without the department's approval" for "that the court considers beneficial to the youth"; in (2), after "45 days", deleted "of evaluation at a reception and evaluation center for youths" and inserted second sentence requiring Department to determine place and manner of youth evaluation; deleted former (4) that read: "(4) If the court finds that placement in a youth care facility other than a youth group home or youth foster home is necessary and in the best interests of the youth and the community, the court shall determine if the youth can receive appropriate treatment in a youth care facility located in Montana as follows:

(a) If the court finds the youth can receive appropriate treatment in a youth care facility located in Montana that will accept the youth, the court may not place the youth in a youth care facility located outside this state unless an out-of-state facility can provide appropriate treatment that:

(i) can be obtained at a cost less than that offered by any available facility in this state; and

(ii) is available in closer proximity to the youth's place of residence than any facility located in this state.

(b) When the department of social and rehabilitation services is ordered to pay the costs of caring for the child in a youth care facility other than a youth foster home or youth group home, the court shall provide the department at least 5 days' written notice and opportunity to be heard before ordering the placement of the youth"; and made minor changes in phraseology.

In preparation of the composite of the Ch. 515 and Ch. 609 amendments to this section, the Code Commissioner codified the Ch. 609 amendment to subsection (1)(c) (former subsection (1)(e)) despite the fact that Ch. 515 deleted former subsection (1)(e) because the Ch. 609 amendment is a complete substitution of the former language.

1986 Amendment: Deleted in second version language relating to 60-day evaluation period, requiring a determination that the youth is seriously mentally ill, and concerning procedures upon a finding of serious mental illness.

Effective Date: The 1986 amendment will be effective on the date the deed of sale of the Montana Youth Treatment Center from the Board of Land Commissioners is delivered to a buyer. (Deed delivered January 1, 1987.)

Repealer: Section 15, Ch. 14, Sp. L. June 1986, also repealed sections 53-21-164, 53-21-501, 53-21-502, and 53-21-505, effective upon the sale.

1985 Amendments: Chapter 531 inserted (7) relating to placement in out-of-state treatment facility.

Chapter 612 in (2) near end, after "youths", deleted "except that if the evaluation is to be done at the Montana youth treatment center, the commitment provisions of 53-21-505 must be followed and no evaluation of a youth may be done at Montana state hospital"; inserted (3) through (6) relating to an evaluation to determine whether a youth is seriously mentally ill; and deleted former (6) that read: "Except as provided in 53-21-507, if the custody of a youth is transferred to the department of institutions under subsection (1), the youth may not be committed to the Montana youth treatment center unless the commitment provisions of 53-21-505 are followed."

1983 Amendments: Chapter 129, after (1)(e), inserted "or"; and in (4), inserted second sentence relating to modification of court order.

Chapter 233 deleted former (2)(b), which read: "in the case of a delinquent youth 16 years or older whom the court considers a suitable person for placement at a youth forest camp, notify the director of the department of institutions of the finding. The director of the department of institutions shall then designate to the court the facility to which the youth shall be delivered for evaluation. The court may then commit the youth to the department of institutions for a period not to exceed 45 days for the purpose of evaluation as to the youth's suitability for placement and order the youth delivered for evaluation to the youth facility designated by the director. If after the evaluation the department of institutions reports to the court that such child is suitable for placement in a youth forest camp and if there is space available at a camp, the court may then commit such child directly to the youth forest camp under the terms of commitment of this chapter. If the department of institutions reports and states the reasons to the court why the youth is not suitable for placement, the youth shall be returned to the court for such further disposition as the court may consider advisable under the provisions of this chapter. The costs of transporting the youth to the designated youth facility for evaluation and cost of returning the youth to the court shall be borne by the county of residence of the youth."; and at end of (3), deleted "except as provided by subsection (2)(b)".

Chapter 363, at end of (2), inserted exception clause and Ch. 361 substituted "Montana state hospital" for "Warm Springs state hospital" in that clause; Ch. 363 inserted (6).

Chapter 465 made the following changes: in (1)(b), substituted present language for "place in a licensed foster home or a home approved by the court"; at end of (1)(c), deleted "including but not limited to a district youth guidance home"; and at end of (1)(e), deleted "consistent with subsection (1)(d) of this section".

Case Notes

Statute Reasonably Related to Purposes of Youth Court Act — Constitutionality Affirmed: A consent adjustment without petition is an informal tool used by a probation officer when a youth is alleged to have violated the law but the officer does not believe it would be in the best interests of the youth, the family, and the public to file a formal petition. In this case, a youth contended that the provision of 41-5-1512 that allows a consent adjustment without petition violated due process by allowing the state and the Youth Court to proceed from an informal consent adjustment to formal revocation and disposition without requiring the filing of formal charges and without assurances that the youth's admission of violation was voluntary, knowing, and intelligent. The Supreme Court disagreed. Permitting the Youth Court to enforce the violation of informal consent adjustments without requiring a petition or finding that the youth is delinquent or in need of intervention has a reasonable and rational relationship to the express purposes of the Youth Court Act. The Act is designed to promote the welfare of the youth, and the disposition of a youth without going through formal proceedings is designed as a consistent, enforceable, and avoidable consequence of the youth's failure to comply with the terms of the agreement, rather than as a punitive measure. The youth failed to prove that 41-5-1512 was unconstitutional beyond a reasonable doubt, and the Supreme Court affirmed the statute's constitutionality. In re Cause No. CDJ 08-0133(A), 2009 MT 355, 353 M 194, 219 P3d 1255 (2009).

Failure to Preserve Question of Constitutionality of Youth Court Procedure — Appeal Dismissed: Two youths who entered an informal consent adjustment without petition later violated the consent adjustments and the state petitioned to revoke the consent adjustments. Following a hearing at which the youths admitted the violations, the Youth Court revoked the consent adjustments and proceeded to formal disposition under 41-5-1512. The youths appealed on grounds that 41-5-1512 was unconstitutional on its face and as applied because it allowed formal revocation and disposition based on admissions made through informal involuntary means and that without a formal charging petition, the informal admissions were effectively equated as formal admissions or as findings that the youths were in need of intervention, which relieved the state of its burden of proof. The Supreme Court declined to reach the constitutionality question because the argument was not properly preserved for appeal through a sufficiently specific objection. In re B.I. & N.G., 2009 MT 350, 353 M 183, 218 P3d 1235 (2009). See also St. v. Benson, 1999 MT 324, 297 M 321, 992 P2d 831 (1999).

Restitution Owing Under Youth Court Act — Market Value Versus Replacement Cost — Deduction of Salvage Value From Restitution Amount: T.M.R., a youth, stole a vehicle from his friend's parents' garage and went for a joyride. The vehicle was destroyed, and the youth was placed on probation and ordered to pay restitution. The parties disagreed on the amount of restitution owed. The Supreme Court noted that prior to the 2003 amendments to adult sentencing statutes, restitution was consistently based on market value if it could be ascertained. Unlike the adult sentencing statutes, the Montana Youth Court Act was not amended in 2003 to include replacement cost as a way to determine restitution. Thus, the court concluded that the more equitable and consistent approach to determine restitution under the Act was to measure damages based on market value. The court noted that the victims received $500 in salvage value for the vehicle and also held that the restitution amount should be reduced by the amount of salvage received. In re T.M.R., 2006 MT 246, 334 M 64, 144 P3d 809 (2006).

No Authority of Youth Court to Order Youth to Pay Restitution Past Age of Majority: In 2000, a 12-year-old who admitted sexually assaulting an 8-year-old was adjudicated a delinquent youth by the Youth Court and placed on probation until age 18. Probation conditions included payment of restitution and the costs of the victim's therapy. In 2003, the Youth Court was notified by a restitution officer that a therapist had advised that counseling for the victim and the victim's mother was complete and that the restitution amount owed was $4,507.53; however, no restitution hearing was held. Nevertheless, the state and the youth's parents executed a restitution agreement specifying that the youth was liable for payment of restitution and identifying $4,507.53 as the total restitution due. The Youth Court signed the 2003 agreement, and $4,507.53 was subsequently paid in full. In 2005, the state requested a restitution hearing, noting that the victim's mother had submitted additional restitution claims of $4,352.93 for therapeutic sports activity for the victim and $8,309.25 for university schooling costs for the mother. At a hearing held 2 days before the end of the youth's probation, the Youth Court claimed jurisdiction over the youth for financial purposes until the youth turned 21 and ordered the youth to pay $12,662.18 in additional restitution to cover the mother's claims for sports and school-related costs. The youth appealed on grounds that the Youth Court had no authority to order additional restitution, and the Supreme Court reversed. The Youth Court limited its retention of jurisdiction beyond the youth's 18th birthday to enforcement of financial obligations set forth in the original disposition order and in the 2003 agreement establishing the total restitution to be paid by the youth. Therefore, the Youth Court did not have jurisdiction to impose additional restitution in a stand-alone order after the youth's probation, of which payment of restitution was a condition, expired, and the Supreme Court remanded with instructions to vacate the order for additional restitution. In re K.D.K., 2006 MT 187, 333 M 100, 141 P3d 1212 (2006).

Consideration of Juvenile's Prior Offenses Proper in Ordering Psychosexual Evaluation Under Youth Court Act: The Youth Court considered a juvenile's prior record in ordering a psychosexual evaluation prior to disposition. On appeal, the youth contended that under St. v. Ommundson, 1999 MT 16, 293 M 133, 974 P2d 620 (1999), consideration of the prior offenses was error because the prior charges were unrelated to the charges in question. The Supreme Court distinguished Ommundson, a criminal matter, from the present case that was brought under the Montana Youth Court Act and held that Ommundson did not bar the Youth Court from ordering a psychosexual evaluation of the youth that was essential to the youth's appropriate placement. State ex rel. D.M.B. v. District Court, 2004 MT 335, 324 M 190, 103 P3d 514 (2004).

Predispositional Psychosexual Evaluation Without Youth's Consent Authorized Only as Part of Court Disposition — Consideration of Prior Youth Court Offenses Allowed: The Youth Court, over a youth's objection, ordered a psychosexual evaluation for the youth. The specific language of 41-5-1503 controlled over the more general provisions of 41-5-1511. The Supreme Court held that under 41-5-1503, youths must waive their constitutional rights in order to be subjected to a predispositional medical or psychological evaluation. Thus, the District Court erred in ordering a predispositional psychosexual evaluation over the youth's objection. However, the challenged evaluation was essential to the youth's appropriate placement and to the purposes of the Montana Youth Court Act, so the Supreme Court affirmed. State ex rel. D.M.B. v. District Court, 2004 MT 335, 324 M 190, 103 P3d 514 (2004).

Transfer of Youth Court Case to District Court Not Violative of Minor's Constitutional Rights: Spina argued that the statute allowing transfer of her Youth Court case to the District Court resulted in violation of her rights under Art. II, sec. 15, Mont. Const., which guarantees to minors the same fundamental rights afforded to adults, and under Art. II, sec. 24, Mont. Const., which guarantees the right to a fair trial. The Supreme Court considered alleged violations of the right against self-incrimination, the right to effective assistance of counsel, the right to a fair trial, and the right to a presumption of innocence, finding that Spina's arguments were without merit. The transfer statute did not violate Spina's constitutional rights. St. v. Spina, 1999 MT 113, 294 M 367, 982 P2d 421, 56 St. Rep. 467 (1999).

Placement of Youth With Noncustodial Parent as Condition of Probation Reversed: A.Z.Y. was found by the Youth Court to be a delinquent youth, was placed on probation under the supervision of the Youth Court Probation Department, and, as a condition of probation under this section (formerly 41-5-523), was released to the custody of his father with the condition that he live with his father in Seattle, Washington. The Supreme Court held that A.Z.Y.'s father's home was not A.Z.Y.'s home within the meaning of this section (formerly 41-5-523) and that as a result of 1987 amendments to the Montana Youth Court Act, the Department of Family Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) was to control the placement of a delinquent youth placed other than in the youth's home. For these reasons, the Supreme Court held that the Youth Court exceeded its authority in placing A.Z.Y. in his father's home as a condition of probation. In re A.Z.G., 273 M 525, 905 P2d 1098, 52 St. Rep. 1108 (1995).

Statute Not Vague or Unconstitutionally Broad: This section (formerly 41-5-523) is not unconstitutionally broad on its face in giving the power to the Department of Family Services (now Department of Corrections) to make placements of youth committed to its custody and care by a Youth Court. Further, this section (formerly 41-5-523) clearly outlines the options and limitations in disposition available to a Youth Court and clearly places limits on the Department in its placement and rehabilitation of youth committed to its custody and care; therefore, the statute is not vague. In re T.A.S., 244 M 259, 797 P2d 217, 47 St. Rep. 1590 (1990).

Youth Properly Adjudicated Delinquent Improperly Committed to Correctional Facility: H.F. violated the terms of her probation by violating curfew and using alcohol. She was adjudged a delinquent youth and placed in the custody of the Department of Family Services (now Department of Corrections) until age 19. H.F. was also placed in a youth correctional facility on the basis of being a serious juvenile offender. The Supreme Court held that the youth had properly been designated a delinquent youth and placed in the Department's custody. However, the acts that constituted a violation of her probation were not the serious acts set out in the statutory definition of a serious juvenile offender. Therefore, the Youth Court was without authority to place her in a correctional facility. In re H.F., 242 M 381, 791 P2d 53, 47 St. Rep. 826 (1990).

Youth Incorrectly Placed in Correctional Facility: H.F.'s mother filed a complaint charging the youth with ungovernable behavior. H.F. entered into a consent agreement that established 13 rules of probation. The youth subsequently violated several of the rules, was adjudicated a delinquent youth, was committed to the Department of Family Services (now Department of Corrections) until the age of 19, and was ordered placed in a secure correctional facility. The Supreme Court ruled that although the youth was correctly designated delinquent, her only offenses were status offenses. Under this section (formerly 41-5-523), because she could not be imprisoned for the violations, she could not be placed in a correctional facility. In re H.F., 242 M 381, 791 P2d 53, 47 St. Rep. 757 (1990).

Commitment to Pine Hills Remanded — Lack of Alcohol Dependency Treatment Program: Based on curfew violations, the District Court ordered a youth committed to Pine Hills School (now Pine Hills Youth Correctional Facility) for the protection of the public and its property. However, the record showed the youth needed alcohol dependency treatment, which was unavailable at Pine Hills. The Supreme Court reversed the commitment and remanded for consideration of a less restrictive alternative that would allow for treatment. In re J.F., 241 M 434, 787 P2d 364, 47 St. Rep. 420 (1990).

No Absolute Right to Counsel at Placement Hearing — Due Process: A delinquent youth was not denied due process when, pursuant to this section (formerly 41-5-523), he was placed in a youth incarceration facility without an adversarial hearing to decide his placement. Beyond commitment of the youth by the Youth Court, the delinquent youth has no absolute right to counsel at the placement hearing. However, the youth is not without due process rights at the hearing stage. A youth placement committee created by 41-5-525 (renumbered 41-5-121) makes a recommendation to the Department of Family Services (now Department of Corrections), which can accept or reject the recommendation under 41-5-527 (renumbered 41-5-123, now repealed). In addition, the Youth Court can modify that decision if placement is not in the best interests of the child. In re Peterson, 235 M 313, 767 P2d 319, 46 St. Rep. 13 (1989).

Separation of Powers — Commitment by Youth Court: Pursuant to this section (formerly 41-5-523), the Youth Court committed a delinquent youth to the Department of Family Services (now Department of Corrections) for placement in an appropriate facility. The youth appealed the placement, contending that the judiciary is the proper decisionmaking body for the placement of delinquent youths. In response to the youth's allegation that it is a violation of the separation of powers clause of the state constitution for the Department to make the placement decision, the Supreme Court held that there is no violation because the statute provides authority to the Youth Court to decide the commitment of delinquent youths and youths in need of supervision (now youth in need of intervention) and that authority is not diminished through granting the Department placement power. The court has the authority to review the placement decision to determine if it is in the best interests of the minor. In re Peterson, 235 M 313, 767 P2d 319, 46 St. Rep. 13 (1989).

Transfer of Youth From Treatment Facility to Department: Given the Youth Court's power under 41-5-523 (renumbered 41-5-1512) to place a youth in the custody of the Department of Institutions (now Department of Corrections) and in a youth care facility, the court's order that the youth be transferred automatically from a treatment center to the custody of the Department of Institutions (now Department of Corrections) was a proper disposition. The Youth Court held a dispositional hearing and issued an order directing that temporary custody of the youth be placed in the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Corrections) for treatment. The court is not required to hold another hearing before the youth is placed in the custody of the Department of Institutions (now Department of Corrections). St. v. Twoteeth, 219 M 101, 711 P2d 789, 42 St. Rep. 1873 (1985).

Youth Not Denied Equal Protection by Sentencing System More Severe Than System Imposed on Adults: A youth has not been denied her right to equal protection of the law by imposition of a term of commitment upon her that is longer than the criminal sentence an adult would receive for the same act. Adults and minors are not similarly situated with respect to state sentencing laws because: (1) the purpose of their detention is not the same, that of the adult offender being both retributional and rehabilitational; and (2) the physical liberty interests of minors and adults are qualitatively different. In re C.S., 210 M 144, 687 P2d 57, 41 St. Rep. 970 (1984), followed in In re T.A.S., 244 M 259, 797 P2d 217, 47 St. Rep. 1590 (1990).

Attorney General's Opinions

Indigent Youth Entitled to Counsel — Reimbursement: When a petition is filed initiating proceedings under the Montana Youth Court Act, a youth is entitled to court-appointed counsel when the youth is indigent and the youth's parents have sufficient financial resources but refuse to employ counsel. A Youth Court may order reimbursement from nonindigent parents for expenses associated with court-appointed counsel. 42 A.G. Op. 88 (1988).

Commitment Procedures to Be Followed in Committing Mentally Ill Youth — Private Mental Health Facilities Not Precluded: This section (formerly 41-5-523) does not authorize the Youth Court or the Department of Family Services (now Department of Corrections) to commit a mentally ill or seriously mentally ill youth to a mental health treatment facility without following the commitment procedures set out in Title 53, ch. 21, part 1. There is, however, no statutory preclusion of commitment of a youth to private mental health facilities. 42 A.G. Op. 59 (1988).

41-5-1513. Disposition — delinquent youth — restrictions.

Compiler's Comments

2009 Amendment: Chapter 373 inserted (2)(d) requiring the imposition of adult restrictions on youth level 3 offenders in certain circumstances; inserted (3) requiring notification to the school superintendent of the district where a youth level 3 offender is enrolled; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 28, 2009.

Retroactive Applicability: Section 4, Ch. 373, L. 2009, provided: "[This act] applies retroactively, within the meaning of 1-2-109, to a delinquent youth, as defined in 41-5-103, adjudicated for the commission of a sexual offense, as defined in 46-23-502, before [the effective date of this act] [effective April 28, 2009] but for whom no disposition has been ordered pursuant to 41-5-1513."

2007 Amendments — Composite Section: Chapter 398 in (3) in second sentence near beginning after "may" inserted "not" and at end inserted exception clause; in (4) near middle substituted "annual allocation" for "account"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective June 30, 2007.

Chapter 483 in (1)(c) at beginning of first sentence inserted "subject to the provisions of subsection (5)", after "would be a" deleted "sexual offense or", after "register" inserted "and remain registered", and after "as a" deleted "sexual or" and in second sentence at end inserted "to ensure registration compliance"; inserted (1)(d) allowing a delinquent youth adjudicated for a sexual offense to be exempt from registration under certain circumstances; in (2) in introductory clause after "adjudicated for a" substituted "sexual offense, as defined in 46-23-502" for "sex offense" and after "court" substituted "shall" for "may"; inserted (2)(a) requiring the court to order a psychosexual evaluation prior to disposition; inserted (2)(b) requiring the court to designate the youth's risk level; in (2)(c) after "treatment" deleted "before a youth is discharged"; inserted (5) establishing the duration of registration for a youth; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective May 11, 2007.

Severability: Section 29, Ch. 483, L. 2007, was a severability clause.

Retroactive Applicability: Section 31, Ch. 483, L. 2007, provided: "[Sections 2, 3, and 19 through 24] [amending 41-5-216, 41-5-1513, 46-23-502, 46-23-504, 46-23-505, 46-23-506, 46-23-508, and 46-23-509] apply retroactively, within the meaning of 1-2-109, to:

(1) sexual offenders who are sentenced or who are in the custody or under the supervision of the department of corrections on or after July 1, 1989; and

(2) violent offenders who are sentenced or who are in the custody or under the supervision of the department of corrections on or after October 1, 1995."

2003 Amendment: Chapter 157 in (1)(b) deleted former second sentence that read: "The court may not place a youth adjudicated delinquent in a state youth correctional facility for an offense that would be a misdemeanor if committed by an adult unless the court finds that the youth presents a danger to the public safety and that the placement is recommended by a mental health professional after evaluation of the youth"; and inserted introductory clause and (1)(b)(i) through (1)(b)(iii) providing that a delinquent youth may not be placed in a state youth correctional facility for an act that would be a misdemeanor if committed by an adult unless certain conditions exist. Amendment effective October 1, 2003.

2001 Amendment: Chapter 587 in (1)(b) near beginning of first sentence substituted "41-5-1512(1)(o)(i)" for "41-5-1512(15)(a)" and inserted third sentence providing that provisions of 41-5-355 relating to alternative placements apply to placements under subsection (1)(b); inserted (3) prohibiting court from ordering local government entity to pay for care, treatment, intervention, or placement, but allowing order for local government entity to pay for evaluation and in-state transportation of youth; and inserted (4) prohibiting court from ordering state government entity from paying for care, treatment, intervention, placement, or evaluation that results in account deficit for district without cost containment review panel approval. Amendment effective July 1, 2001.

1999 Amendment: Chapter 532 in (1)(b) at beginning of first sentence inserted "subject to 41-5-1504, 41-5-1512(15)(a), and 41-5-1522" and at end substituted "and recommend to the department that the youth not be released until the youth reaches 18 years of age" for "or in a correctional facility or a program operated by the department" and inserted second sentence concerning placement of youth adjudicated delinquent; deleted former (1)(c) that read: "(c) subject to 41-5-1504, 41-5-1512(15)(a), and 41-5-1522, sentence a youth to one of the state youth correctional facilities established under 52-5-101 and, as part of the sentence, deny the youth eligibility for release without the express approval of the sentencing judge until the youth reaches 18 years of age. A youth may not be sentenced to a state youth correctional facility unless the department informs the judge that space is available for the youth at that facility. Except as provided in subsection (2), the sentencing judge may not place limitations on the release unless recommended by the youth placement committee. The court may not place a youth adjudicated delinquent in a state youth correctional facility for an offense that would be a misdemeanor if committed by an adult, unless the court finds that the youth presents a danger to public safety and that the placement is recommended by a mental health professional after evaluation of the youth"; near end of first clause of (1)(c) substituted "sexual or violent offender" for "sex offender"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 1999.

Intervention in Delinquency Pilot Program: Section 73, Ch. 550, L. 1997, was not codified in the MCA because of its temporary nature. Under this section, the Department of Corrections is to gather information regarding the placement of youthful offenders and present a proposal to the 56th Legislature.

Saving Clause: Section 79, Ch. 550, L. 1997, was a saving clause.

Severability: Section 80, Ch. 550, L. 1997, was a severability clause.

Effective Date: Section 81, Ch. 550, L. 1997, provided that this section is effective July 1, 1997.

Youth Court Authority to Place Youth in Facility Following Fourth and Fifth Misdemeanors Within Twelve Months: K.M.G. appeared before the Youth Court on fourth and fifth misdemeanor charges after violating his conditions of probation. The Youth Court found K.M.G. to be a delinquent youth and sentenced him to placement at a youth correctional facility. K.M.G. contended on appeal that the placement was in error because none of the statutory placement criteria in 41-5-1513 was met. The Supreme Court disagreed, holding that: K.M.G. committed four or more misdemeanors during the prior 12 months; he waived his objection as to the appropriateness of the mental health professional who performed his evaluation; and the Youth Court's order was supported by sufficient evidence adequately demonstrating K.M.G.'s dangerousness to the public, including K.M.G.'s history of noncompliance with parental, school, law enforcement, and probationary rules and authority, as well as criminal and violent behaviors. Registration of Youth Sex Offender in Public Interest: Following a youth's adjudication as a sex offender, the probation officer notified the youth that he was required to register as an offender pursuant to this section. The youth registered but then moved the District Court to delete the registration requirement. The court held two hearings on the issue, allowing the youth to present evidence and witnesses to support the claim, but held that the youth was required to register. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. The youth failed to demonstrate sufficient mitigating factors to establish that the registration requirement imposed by the court would not be in the public's best interest. In re C.D.H., 2009 MT 8, 349 M 1, 201 P3d 126 (2009).

Youth Court Adjudication Not Considered Conviction — No Authority to Require Adjudicated Youth to Register as Sexual or Violent Offender Under Pre-2007 Law: In 1998, 16-year-old Hastings was adjudicated a delinquent youth in Youth Court, admitting one offense of sexual intercourse without consent, and was committed to the Department of Corrections (DOC). When Hastings turned 18 in 2000, his case was transferred to District Court until age 25 based on the parties' stipulation that Hastings had not completed sex offender treatment or paid restitution and was at high risk to reoffend. The District Court then determined that Hastings had violated the conditions of the Youth Court order and committed Hastings to the DOC and also required that Hastings register as a level 2 sex offender. Hastings initially registered as a sex offender, but failed to update registration after moving and was subsequently charged with failure to maintain registration. Hastings moved to dismiss the charge, asserting that he had not been convicted of a sexual offense and that neither the commitment order nor statutes required him to register after discharging his sentence. The motion was denied, and Hastings appealed. The Supreme Court reversed. Although the Youth Court had the authority to require sex offender registration pursuant to this section, no requirement was made in this case. Because the Youth Court adjudication did not constitute a conviction, the District Court could not impose registration requirements under 46-18-201. (Note that the 2007 Legislature amended 46-23-502 to include an adjudicated youth in the definition of a sexual or violent offender.) The District Court's opinion that this section suggests a wholesale incorporation of sexual offender registry into the Montana Youth Court Act was erroneous, and absent statutory authority, a court may not impose a registration requirement. Failure to grant Hastings' motion to dismiss was error, and the case was remanded for dismissal. St. v. Hastings, 2007 MT 294, 340 M 1, 171 P3d 726 (2007), distinguishing St. v. Mount, 2003 MT 275, 317 M 481, 78 P3d 829 (2003), and St. v. Villanueva, 2005 MT 192, 328 M 135, 118 P3d 179 (2005).

Restitution Owing Under Youth Court Act — Market Value Versus Replacement Cost — Deduction of Salvage Value From Restitution Amount: T.M.R., a youth, stole a vehicle from his friend's parents' garage and went for a joyride. The vehicle was destroyed, and the youth was placed on probation and ordered to pay restitution. The parties disagreed on the amount of restitution owed. The Supreme Court noted that prior to the 2003 amendments to adult sentencing statutes, restitution was consistently based on market value if it could be ascertained. Unlike the adult sentencing statutes, the Montana Youth Court Act was not amended in 2003 to include replacement cost as a way to determine restitution. Thus, the court concluded that the more equitable and consistent approach to determine restitution under the Act was to measure damages based on market value. The court noted that the victims received $500 in salvage value for the vehicle and also held that the restitution amount should be reduced by the amount of salvage received. In re T.M.R., 2006 MT 246, 334 M 64, 144 P3d 809 (2006).

Washington Youth Sexual Offender Required to Register as Sexual or Violent Offender if Residing in Montana: At age 15, Villanueva was adjudicated guilty of first degree rape in Washington state and was later required to register for life in that state as a sexual offender. Villanueva subsequently moved to Montana where he resided for 6 weeks. After being arrested for a domestic disturbance, it was discovered that Villanueva had not registered as a sexual or violent offender in Montana, and he was charged with failure to register. Villanueva contended that Montana law did not apply to his Washington registration requirement because he did not meet the definition of sexual or violent offender under 46-23-502 and because a 1989 Attorney General's opinion held that juveniles adjudicated delinquent under the Montana Youth Court Act whose cases have not been transferred to District Court are not required to register. Villanueva moved to dismiss the charge, but the District Court denied the motion. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Although the Washington definition of sexual offender may not have been identical to the Montana definition, Villanueva was nevertheless a sexual offender under Washington law and was therefore required to register in Montana under 46-23-504. Further, Villanueva could not rely on the Attorney General's opinion because he was not adjudicated under the Montana Youth Court Act. The Supreme Court noted that the Washington sexual offender registration law also required Villanueva to register in another state if he changed state residency, so under both Washington and Montana law, Villanueva was required to register as a sexual offender. Villanueva's motion to dismiss was properly denied. St. v. Villanueva, 2005 MT 192, 328 M 135, 118 P3d 179 (2005).

Case Notes

No Error in Failure to Specify Length of Youth Commitment: The Youth Court committed K.M.G. to the custody of the Department of Corrections until K.M.G. reached age 18 or was released sooner by the Department. K.M.G. contended that the commitment order was invalid because it failed to limit the maximum time of commitment. The Supreme Court held that the commitment order was valid. Pursuant to 41-5-1522, K.M.G. could be committed only for the maximum period that could be imposed on an adult convicted of the same offenses. Thus, there was nothing illegal in leaving the specific determination of the length of his placement to the Department. In re K.M.G., 2010 MT 81, 356 Mont. 91, 229 P.3d 1227.

Youth Pleading True to Trespass — Motion to Dismiss for Lack of Probable Cause Properly Denied: K.J. received several citations for trespassing on housing authority property after receiving notice that he was not allowed on the property. K.J. argued in Youth Court that the notice should be voided because it was insufficient to alert K.J. of the potentially criminal nature of his conduct and that there was thus insufficient probable cause for conviction of the trespass charges. K.J. subsequently pleaded true to the charges and appealed. The Supreme Court initially declined to address K.J.'s constitutional due process argument because the issue was not raised in the Youth Court. The court then noted that K.J. read and signed the notice and later admitted through a plea agreement that he had trespassed and knew that he was barred from entering the property. The Youth Court correctly determined that probable cause existed to present a question of fact for the jury as to whether K.J. knowingly entered the property at a time when he could be arrested for unlawful entry, and because K.J. chose to plead true to the charges rather than present evidence to a jury, the Youth Court properly denied K.J.'s motion to dismiss for lack of probable cause. Part Case Notes Unconstitutionality of Act Requires Striking of Adult and Juvenile Dispositions: W.G. pleaded guilty to several felony charges. The District Court adjudicated W.G., a delinquent youth under 45-5-103, and found on its own motion that 41-5-1102, et seq. (renumbered Title 41, ch. 5, part 16), the Extended Jurisdiction Prosecution Act (EJPA), applied to the case of W.G. Accordingly, the District Court sentenced W.G. as a minor to the custody of the Department of Corrections until his 21st birthday under supervised probation, required that he attend a chemical dependency program, and required that he pay one-half the total restitution and that W.G.'s mother pay the other one-half of the restitution. The District Court then sentenced W.G. as an adult to 5 concurrent years on each of two counts and stayed the execution of those sentences on condition of no new offenses. Because the Supreme Court held in In re S.L.M., 287 M 23, 951 P2d 1365 (1997), that the EJPA was unconstitutional, the state argued that both minor and adult adjudications must be vacated and the case remanded for resentencing, while W.G.'s counsel argued that the adult adjudication only must be struck and that the juvenile adjudication must be implemented. The Supreme Court held that, in as much as the juvenile adjudication was made in conjunction with and in contemplation of the adult adjudication, both adjudications must be stricken and that W.G. must be resentenced. In re W.G., 1999 MT 2, 293 M 16, 973 P2d 217, 56 St. Rep. 9 (1999).

Imposition of Both Juvenile and Adult Sentences — Level of Constitutional Scrutiny: Imposition of both juvenile and adult sentences under the Extended Jurisdiction Prosecution Act infringed upon the juvenile's physical liberty. Physical liberty is a fundamental right under the Montana Constitution. Therefore, the court must apply strict scrutiny analysis to the claim that the Act violates the Montana Constitution's equal protection and rights of minors clauses by subjecting the juvenile to a longer period of incarceration than an adult committing the same offense, and there must be a compelling state interest sufficient to justify the Act. In re S.L.M., 287 M 23, 951 P2d 1365, 54 St. Rep. 1480 (1997).

Unconstitutional to Impose Both a Juvenile and an Adult Sentence Upon Youth: The 1995 amendments to the purpose section of the Montana Youth Court Act made the Act espouse much more preventative, if not punitive, goals because the Act was amended to seek to prevent delinquency through imposition of enforceable and immediate consequences upon juveniles and to establish programs of detention and community protection. Obviously, it is no longer accurate to reason, as the Supreme Court did in In re C.H., 210 M 184, 683 P2d 931 (1984), that the Act's infringements upon juveniles' physical liberty are legitimate means of enhancing their protections within the meaning of Art. II, sec. 15, Mont. Const., providing that minors have all the fundamental rights of Art. II unless specifically precluded by laws that enhance the protection of minors. Moreover, it is no longer accurate to state, as the court did in In re C.S., 210 M 144, 687 P2d 57 (1984), that a Youth Court disposition is strictly for rehabilitation, not retribution. Indeed, the Extended Jurisdiction Prosecution Act (EJPA), by requiring the Youth Court to impose an adult sentence in addition to a juvenile sentence, with the adult portion stayed pending successful completion of the juvenile portion, goes beyond mere rehabilitation of a juvenile and injects the specter of retribution. Thus, the EJPA, on its face, violates the equal protection clause of Art. II, sec. 4, Mont. Const., by treating juveniles more harshly than adults. The EJPA also violates Art. II, sec. 15, by reducing, rather than enhancing, juveniles' rights as compared to adults' rights. The state has no compelling state interest in treating a juvenile as an adult and restricting the juvenile's physical liberty beyond the restrictions that are imposed upon an adult who commits the same offense as the juvenile. Furthermore, the paternalistic rationale of parens patriae does not apply to distinguish between the treatment of a juvenile and an adult when a juvenile is no longer sentenced solely as a juvenile, but as an adult as well. Although the EJPA is subject to a severability clause, the sentencing portion of the EJPA is necessary to its integrity; thus, the remaining provisions of the EJPA cannot be saved by the severability clause. In re S.L.M., 287 M 23, 951 P2d 1365, 54 St. Rep. 1480 (1997). See also, as to the remedy for sentencing pursuant to the unconstitutional Extended Jurisdiction Prosecution Act, In re W.G., 1999 MT 2, 293 M 16, 973 P2d 217, 56 St. Rep. 9 (1999).

Youth's Standing to Challenge Imposition of Both Juvenile and Adult Sentence: Youth given both juvenile and adult sentences under the Extended Jurisdiction Prosecution Act, with the adult portion stayed pending successful completion of the juvenile portion, who were not the subject of a proceeding to revoke the stay, had standing to challenge the Act on the ground that the Act subjected them to a longer period of incarceration than that permitted for an adult who committed the same offense. There was a threatened injury to the youth's civil rights, and they suffered a legitimate and realistic fear that the adult sentence would be carried out if they violated the juvenile sentence. In re S.L.M., 287 M 23, 951 P2d 1365, 54 St. Rep. 1480 (1997).

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 537, L. 1999, provided: "WHEREAS, juveniles who are 17 to 18 years of age frequently have difficulty completing their Youth Court sentences, particularly felony offenses, before they reach age 18; and

WHEREAS, extending juvenile jurisdiction with the possibility of an adult sanction for failure to comply with the conditions of a stayed sentence or for additional criminal behavior by the youth has been shown to be an effective incentive in other states to rehabilitate juveniles to keep them out of the adult correctional system and allow them to pay restitution, finish treatment, and complete their education; and

WHEREAS, the maximum extension or period of jurisdiction may not exceed the period of an adult sentence without violating equal protection; and

WHEREAS, limiting section 41-5-208, MCA, supervision transfers after the youth reaches the age of 18 to additional community corrections programs of the Department of Corrections subject to the same adult sentence limit on supervision will also allow juveniles to complete their sentences, to be held accountable, and to avoid an adult conviction, without violating equal protection of the laws."

Severability: Section 7, Ch. 537, L. 1999, was a severability clause.

1997 Amendment: Chapter 498 throughout section substituted "extended jurisdiction juvenile prosecution" for "extended jurisdiction prosecution"; in (1)(a) substituted "county attorney" for "prosecutor"; inserted (1)(b) referring to case designated by County Attorney as extended jurisdiction juvenile prosecution and in which youth is alleged to have committed certain crimes; in (1)(b)(i) substituted "an offense that is listed under 41-5-206" for "the alleged offense is transferable under 41-5-206"; in (1)(b)(ii) substituted "any offense that would be a felony if committed by an adult in which the youth allegedly used a firearm, if the youth was at least 12 years of age at the time of the alleged offense" for "the youth was at least 12 years of age at the time of the alleged offense and allegedly used a weapon"; inserted (1)(c) referring to cases designated by court as extended jurisdiction juvenile prosecutions; in (2) substituted "retain jurisdiction as provided in 41-5-205" for "retain jurisdiction until the case is transferred to district court under this part or jurisdiction is terminated under the provisions of 41-5-205"; and made minor changes in style. Case Notes

Revocation of Youth Court Probation and Imposition of Suspended Sentence Proper: When Hinkle was 17 years old, he pleaded true to the charge of negligent homicide. The case was tried in District Court, and Hinkle was committed to the Youth Court for suspended placement in a treatment facility until age 18, placed on formal juvenile probation until age 25, and given a stayed adult sentence of 20 years with the Department of Corrections, pursuant to 22 probation conditions, including requirements that Hinkle not violate the dispositional order, possess or consume alcohol, or commit a new offense. Twelve days after the sentencing hearing, Hinkle was cited for being a minor in possession of alcohol. The Youth Court revoked Hinkle's probation and transferred the case back to District Court for further proceedings. After considering numerous balancing factors, the District Court imposed the 20-year adult sentence that had been stayed, but suspended the sentence subject to 19 conditions, including prohibiting Hinkle from entering casinos and gambling. Hinkle appealed on grounds that his probation was improperly revoked, that the 20-year sentence was improperly imposed, and that the casino and gambling restriction was illegal. The Supreme Court affirmed on all issues. The District Court did not err in concluding that simply continuing Hinkle's youth probation for the probation violations would be no more than a slap on the wrist and would be inappropriate given the seriousness of the underlying homicide offense. Imposing a suspended adult sentence was in fact a further act of grace, in light of the fact that the court could have imposed a 20-year sentence of confinement, but Hinkle ignored the act of grace in asserting that the suspended sentence was unduly harsh. Additionally, Hinkle's personal characteristics made him particularly vulnerable to the pitfalls of irresponsible gambling, so the casino and gambling restriction was appropriate. Thus, the District Court's order was "neither arbitrary nor without conscientious judgment or exceeding the bounds of reason and was an appropriate exercise of discretion". St. v. Hinkle, 2008 MT 217, 344 M 236, 186 P3d 1279 (2008).

Youth Court Jurisdiction Improperly Extended for Youth Charged With Crime Punishable by Life in Prison: In the case of a youth charged with felony sexual intercourse without consent, the Youth Court was without legal basis to extend its jurisdiction beyond the youth's 21st birthday because the youth was charged with a crime punishable by life imprisonment. 1999 Amendment: Chapter 537 in two places in section inserted "except an offense punishable by death or life imprisonment or when a sentence of 100 years could be imposed"; at end of (1) after "shall" inserted "subject to subsection (1)(b), impose a single judgment consisting of"; inserted (1)(b) prohibiting combined time of juvenile disposition plus adult sentence from exceeding maximum period imposed on convicted adult or offenses bringing youth under youth court jurisdiction and clarifying power of department to enter into youth parole agreement; in (3) after "court" deleted "may impose, with the youth's consent, a disposition provided under subsection (1)(b). If the youth does not consent to disposition under subsection (1)(b), the court"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 30, 1999.

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 537, L. 1999, provided: "WHEREAS, juveniles who are 17 to 18 years of age frequently have difficulty completing their Youth Court sentences, particularly felony offenses, before they reach age 18; and

WHEREAS, extending juvenile jurisdiction with the possibility of an adult sanction for failure to comply with the conditions of a stayed sentence or for additional criminal behavior by the youth has been shown to be an effective incentive in other states to rehabilitate juveniles to keep them out of the adult correctional system and allow them to pay restitution, finish treatment, and complete their education; and

WHEREAS, the maximum extension or period of jurisdiction may not exceed the period of an adult sentence without violating equal protection; and

WHEREAS, limiting section 41-5-208, MCA, supervision transfers after the youth reaches the age of 18 to additional community corrections programs of the Department of Corrections subject to the same adult sentence limit on supervision will also allow juveniles to complete their sentences, to be held accountable, and to avoid an adult conviction, without violating equal protection of the laws."

Severability: Section 7, Ch. 537, L. 1999, was a severability clause.

1997 Amendments: Chapter 498 in (1) and (3) substituted "extended jurisdiction juvenile prosecution" for "extended jurisdiction prosecution"; in (1) inserted first sentence requiring adjudicatory hearing and in second sentence substituted "admits to or is adjudicated to have committed an offense that would be a felony if committed by an adult" for "pleads guilty to or is found guilty of an offense described in 41-5-1102(1)(b)"; in (1)(b) substituted "impose any sentence allowed by the statute that establishes the penalty for the offense of which the youth is convicted and that would be permissible if the offender were an adult" for "impose an adult criminal sentence" and deleted third sentence that read: "If the youth violates the conditions of the stay or commits a new offense, the adult criminal sentence must be executed as provided in 41-5-1105"; at beginning of (2) substituted "If a youth prosecuted as an extended jurisdiction juvenile after designation by the county attorney in the delinquency petition under 41-5-1602(1)(b) admits to or is adjudicated to have committed an offense that would be a felony if committed by an adult that is not an offense described in 41-5-1602(1)(b)" for "Except as provided in subsection (3), if a youth in an extended jurisdiction prosecution is convicted of an offense not described in 41-5-1102(1)(b)"; in first sentence of (3), after "prosecution", substituted "admits to or is adjudicated to have committed an offense that would not be a felony if committed by an adult" for "pleads guilty to an offense not described in 41-5-1102(1)(b)" and at end of second sentence substituted "subsection (1)(a)" for "subsection (2)"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective May 2, 1997.

Chapter 550 at end of (1)(a) and (2) inserted reference to 41-5-1513; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1997.

Case Notes

Revocation of Youth Court Probation and Imposition of Suspended Sentence Proper: When Hinkle was 17 years old, he pleaded true to the charge of negligent homicide. The case was tried in District Court, and Hinkle was committed to the Youth Court for suspended placement in a treatment facility until age 18, placed on formal juvenile probation until age 25, and given a stayed adult sentence of 20 years with the Department of Corrections, pursuant to 22 probation conditions, including requirements that Hinkle not violate the dispositional order, possess or consume alcohol, or commit a new offense. Twelve days after the sentencing hearing, Hinkle was cited for being a minor in possession of alcohol. The Youth Court revoked Hinkle's probation and transferred the case back to District Court for further proceedings. After considering numerous balancing factors, the District Court imposed the 20-year adult sentence that had been stayed, but suspended the sentence subject to 19 conditions, including prohibiting Hinkle from entering casinos and gambling. Hinkle appealed on grounds that his probation was improperly revoked, that the 20-year sentence was improperly imposed, and that the casino and gambling restriction was illegal. The Supreme Court affirmed on all issues. The District Court did not err in concluding that simply continuing Hinkle's youth probation for the probation violations would be no more than a slap on the wrist and would be inappropriate given the seriousness of the underlying homicide offense. Imposing a suspended adult sentence was in fact a further act of grace, in light of the fact that the court could have imposed a 20-year sentence of confinement, but Hinkle ignored the act of grace in asserting that the suspended sentence was unduly harsh. Additionally, Hinkle's personal characteristics made him particularly vulnerable to the pitfalls of irresponsible gambling, so the casino and gambling restriction was appropriate. Thus, the District Court's order was "neither arbitrary nor without conscientious judgment or exceeding the bounds of reason and was an appropriate exercise of discretion". St. v. Hinkle, 2008 MT 217, 344 M 236, 186 P3d 1279 (2008).

Immunity of Juvenile Probation Officer for Discretionary Supervisory Acts: Completion of a factsheet by a juvenile probation officer regarding a youth who was on probation was a discretionary, quasi-judicial act. The probation officer was thus entitled to immunity from prosecution for alleged omissions of information from the factsheet, and summary judgment dismissing the probation officer from a suit by the victim of an injury caused by the youth was proper. Part Attorney General's Opinions

County Reimbursement by Board of Crime Control for Indian Youth Placed in Regional Detention Facility by Tribal Court: Title 18, ch. 11, the State-Tribal Cooperative Agreements Act, includes broad authority for counties to enter into agreements with tribes for the delivery of services to their citizens. Although tribes have jurisdiction over tribal member youth, those youth remain citizens of Montana as well as citizens of the tribes, and if the tribes do not provide services, such as youth detention facilities, those tribal youth are nevertheless entitled to be offered state services in the same manner as any other Montana youth. The fact that a tribal court adjudicates the youth does not necessarily disqualify the youth from the receipt of state services. In the present case, Blaine County entered into an agreement with the Fort Belknap Tribe to allow detention in the Blaine County youth detention facility of youth determined by the tribal court to be in need of detention, and Blaine County included the tribal youth population in its survey of youth to be served. The youth detention services were appropriately covered in the county's grant application. Thus, when the county applies for reimbursement for each youth served, regardless of whether the youth is a tribal member or not, the Montana Board of Crime Control is required to reimburse the county for detention costs for the youth, including tribal youth served in a regional detention facility pursuant to an order of a tribal court. 49 A.G. 1991 Amendment: Deleted former (1) through (3) that read: "(1) The county commissioners in each county shall provide for the availability of detention facilities for youths.

(2) (a) The county commissioners may maintain, by purchase, lease, or otherwise, a detention facility, which may not be used for the confinement of adult persons charged with criminal offenses, where delinquent youths may be detained until final disposition.

(b) The county commissioners may appoint necessary personnel who have charge of the facility and of the youths detained therein.

(c) The compensation of the personnel must be fixed by the county commissioners, and the compensation and the maintenance of the facility must be paid out of the county treasury. These funds may be supplemented by state appropriation and federal funds.

(d) The county commissioners shall provide for inspection of any county detention facility every 3 months. Inspection must include but is not limited to health, fire safety, security, rehabilitation programs, recreation, treatment of youths, and personnel training.

(e) The judge of the youth court for the county shall inspect any detention facility at least once a year.

(3) The county commissioners may contract with the department or public or private agencies to purchase detention services"; in (2), (3), (4), (5), and (6), before "facility", inserted "shelter care"; in (3) substituted "accused or convicted of" for "charged with"; in (6), before "detention", inserted "youth"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1991.

1989 Amendment: Inserted (1) relating to County Commissioners' responsibility to provide youth detention facilities; in (2)(a), at beginning, deleted "In all counties", substituted "maintain" for "provide", before "detention facility" deleted "place to be known as the youth", after "delinquent youths" deleted "and youths in need of supervision", and at end deleted "which place shall be maintained by the county as in other like cases"; in (2)(b), after "appoint", substituted "necessary personnel who have charge of the facility" for "such personnel as required, who shall have charge of said facility"; in (2)(c) substituted "maintenance" for "maintaining"; in (2)(e), before "youth court", deleted "district"; inserted (3) relating to County Commissioners' authority to contract for detention services; in (4)(a), before "a shelter care facility", deleted "a place to be known as"; in (4)(f), before "detention facility", deleted "youth"; and made minor changes in phraseology.

1989 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 434, L. 1989, provided: "A statement of intent is required for this bill because [sections 12 and 13] [41-5-315 and 41-5-316, both repealed] require the department of family services [now department of corrections] to adopt rules governing procedures for distributing funds to counties for juvenile detention facilities and services. The rules must require a county applying for funds to provide necessary information to enable the department to determine the financial and administrative feasibility of establishing or acquiring the desired detention facility or services. In addition, the rules must require a county to submit information regarding the safety and habitability of the facility and its compliance with state and federal requirements, such as availability of medical and educational services and physical recreation."

1987 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 475, L. 1987, provided: "A statement of intent is required for this bill because section 5 [41-5-809, renumbered 41-5-1802] allows the department of institutions [now department of corrections] to adopt rules for the licensing of detention facilities.

Currently, Montana statutes make no provision for the licensing of juvenile detention facilities. There are presently two counties in the process of establishing detention facilities who need assurance that their facilities will meet minimum established standards on program operations and environmental conditions.

It is anticipated that the rules developed under this act will establish minimum standards for juvenile detention facilities. These standards should govern such matters as the capacity of the facility, its location, design, construction, equipment and operation, fire and safety precautions, medical services, qualifications and number of personnel, and the quality of services provided to the juveniles.

The rules should contain a procedure for notifying the appropriate officials of compliance or deficiencies. If the facility is found deficient, a procedure for remedying those deficiencies should be included with specific time limitations.

It is anticipated the state will conduct annual inspections of each facility and may require written reports containing such information as the agency may need to set and enforce its standards."

Coordination Instruction: Section 15, Ch. 475, L. 1987, transferred rulemaking authority under this section from the Department of Institutions to the Department of Family Services (now Department of Corrections) if House Bill No. 325 was passed and approved. House Bill No. 325 passed and was approved as Ch. 609, L. 1987, April 24, 1987.

1999 Amendments — Composite Section: Chapter 532 inserted (2)(g) concerning contracts for use of secure detention facilities; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 1999.

Chapter 536 in (1) inserted second sentence defining services; and inserted (4) concerning youth detention facility contracting with a school district for an education program. Amendment effective April 29, 1999.

1991 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 799, L. 1991, provided: "A statement of intent is required for this bill because [section 14] [41-5-1008, renumbered 41-5-1908] grants the board of crime control authority to adopt rules necessary to implement provisions of this bill.

It is the intent of the legislature, in enacting this bill, to provide alternatives to the detention of youth in adult jails in order to meet the requirements of Senate Bill No. 38, which prohibits the detention of youth in adult jails.

In order to ensure that alternatives to jail are established, the legislature intends that each county have the primary responsibility to provide youth detention services, as required by [section 2] [41-5-810, renumbered 41-5-1803]. In addition, in order to stimulate the development of needed services, the legislature intends to provide state grants authorized in [section 8] [41-5-1002, renumbered 41-5-1902], using state and federal funds, to assist counties in providing a spectrum of services for the detention and care of youth. These services are intended to include but are not limited to youth detention facilities, short-term detention centers, holdovers, attendant care, home detention, and programs for the transportation of youth to regional detention facilities.

The legislature intends that counties receiving state grants should share in the costs of services in order to prevent excessive utilization of services and to give counties a financial incentive to hold down program costs. For this reason, [section 10] [41-5-1004, renumbered 41-5-1904] requires that state grants be provided on a matching basis or, if in a block grant, based on a percentage of the approved cost of services.

In order to discourage the use of secure detention and to promote the use of less costly, nonsecure community-based programs, the legislature intends to provide state grants to counties at a higher rate of payment for such services, including holdovers, attendant care, and other alternatives to secure detention.

The legislature further intends that, as a condition of receiving state grants under [section 8] [41-5-1002, renumbered 41-5-1902], each county shall develop a written plan for providing youth detention services, including alternatives to secure detention. The development of county plans is required to ensure that formal planning does, in fact, occur and to make certain that state grants are not provided for services that are not well planned in advance.

As a further condition of receiving state grants under [section 8] [41-5-1002, renumbered 41-5-1902], each county shall, within a reasonable period of time, demonstrate compliance or substantial compliance with state law and policies contained in the Montana Youth Court Act relating to the detention and placement of youth. The legislature intends that the board of crime control review and monitor counties receiving grants under [section 8] [41-5-1002, renumbered 41-5-1902] to assure compliance or substantial compliance with the Montana Youth Court Act.

Finally, the legislature intends that the board of crime control adopt rules as authorized in [section 14] [41-5-1008, renumbered 41-5-1908]. In adopting rules, the board may:

(1) establish requirements for approved holdovers consistent with the definition of holdovers provided in 41-5-103(13);

(2) designate geographical areas of the state that are eligible for creation of a youth detention region under [section 4] [41-5-812, renumbered 41-5-1805]. In designating these areas, the board shall use available state data showing the number of youth held in detention in each county of the state.

(3) adopt procedures governing the distribution and allocation of funds in accordance with [sections 10 and 11] [41-5-1004 and 41-5-1005, renumbered 41-5-1904 and 41-5-1905];

(4) provide a system to review and monitor counties under [section 9] [41-5-1003, renumbered 41-5-1903] to assure that counties receiving grants are in compliance or substantial compliance with the Montana Youth Court Act;

(5) provide standards for determining compliance or substantial compliance with the Montana Youth Court Act pursuant to [section 9] [41-5-1003, renumbered 41-5-1903]. These standards should be based upon comparable standards for compliance with sections 223(a)(12) and 223(a)(14) of the federal Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention Act of 1974.

(6) establish a process for providing notice and fair hearings required under [section 9] [41-5-1003, renumbered 41-5-1903] in order to terminate state grants to counties that fail to attain compliance or substantial compliance with the Montana Youth Court Act."

Effective Date: Section 30, Ch. 799, L. 1991, provided that this section is effective July 1, 1991.

Attorney General's Opinions

County Reimbursement by Board of Crime Control for Indian Youth Placed in Regional Detention Facility by Tribal Court: Title 18, ch. 11, the State-Tribal Cooperative Agreements Act, includes broad authority for counties to enter into agreements with tribes for the delivery of services to their citizens. Although tribes have jurisdiction over tribal member youth, those youth remain citizens of Montana as well as citizens of the tribes, and if the tribes do not provide services, such as youth detention facilities, those tribal youth are nevertheless entitled to be offered state services in the same manner as any other Montana youth. The fact that a tribal court adjudicates the youth does not necessarily disqualify the youth from the receipt of state services. In the present case, Blaine County entered into an agreement with the Fort Belknap Tribe to allow detention in the Blaine County youth detention facility of youth determined by the tribal court to be in need of detention, and Blaine County included the tribal youth population in its survey of youth to be served. The youth detention services were appropriately covered in the county's grant application. Thus, when the county applies for reimbursement for each youth served, regardless of whether the youth is a tribal member or not, the Montana Board of Crime Control is required to reimburse the county for detention costs for the youth, including tribal youth served in a regional detention facility pursuant to an order of a tribal court. 49 A.G. Op. 10 (2001).

The legislature intends that the board of crime control review and monitor counties receiving grants under [section 8] [41-5-1002, renumbered 41-5-1902] to assure compliance or substantial compliance with the Montana Youth Court Act.

Finally, the legislature intends that the board of crime control adopt rules as authorized in [section 14] [41-5-1008, renumbered 41-5-1908]. In adopting rules, the board may:

(1) establish requirements for approved holdovers consistent with the definition of holdovers provided in 41-5-103(13);

1991 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 799, L. 1991, provided: "A statement of intent is required for this bill because [section 14] [41-5-1008, renumbered 41-5-1908] grants the board of crime control authority to adopt rules necessary to implement provisions of this bill.

It is the intent of the legislature, in enacting this bill, to provide alternatives to the detention of youth in adult jails in order to meet the requirements of Senate Bill No. 38, which prohibits the detention of youth in adult jails.

In order to ensure that alternatives to jail are established, the legislature intends that each county have the primary responsibility to provide youth detention services, as required by [section 2] [41-5-810, renumbered 41-5-1803]. In addition, in order to stimulate the development of needed services, the legislature intends to provide state grants authorized in [section 8] [41-5-1002, renumbered 41-5-1902], using state and federal funds, to assist counties in providing a spectrum of services for the detention and care of youth. These services are intended to include but are not limited to youth detention facilities, short-term detention centers, holdovers, attendant care, home detention, and programs for the transportation of youth to regional detention facilities.

The legislature intends that counties receiving state grants should share in the costs of services in order to prevent excessive utilization of services and to give counties a financial incentive to hold down program costs. For this reason, [section 10] [41-5-1004, renumbered 41-5-1904] requires that state grants be provided on a matching basis or, if in a block grant, based on a percentage of the approved cost of services.

In order to discourage the use of secure detention and to promote the use of less costly, nonsecure community-based programs, the legislature intends to provide state grants to counties at a higher rate of payment for such services, including holdovers, attendant care, and other alternatives to secure detention.

The legislature intends that the board of crime control review and monitor counties receiving grants under [section 8] [41-5-1002, renumbered 41-5-1902] to assure compliance or substantial compliance with the Montana Youth Court Act.

Finally, the legislature intends that the board of crime control adopt rules as authorized in [section 14] [41-5-1008, renumbered 41-5-1908]. In adopting rules, the board may:

(1) establish requirements for approved holdovers consistent with the definition of holdovers provided in 41-5-103(13);

(2) designate geographical areas of the state that are eligible for creation of a youth detention region under [section 4] [41-5-812, renumbered 41-5-1805]. In designating these areas, the board shall use available state data showing the number of youth held in detention in each county of the state.

(3) adopt procedures governing the distribution and allocation of funds in accordance with [sections 10 and 11] [41-5-1004 and 41-5-1005, renumbered 41-5-1904 and 41-5-1905];

(4) provide a system to review and monitor counties under [section 9] [41-5-1003, renumbered 41-5-1903] to assure that counties receiving grants are in compliance or substantial compliance with the Montana Youth Court Act;

(5) provide standards for determining compliance or substantial compliance with the Montana Youth Court Act pursuant to [section 9] [41-5-1003, renumbered 41-5-1903]. These standards should be based upon comparable standards for compliance with sections 223(a)(12) and 223(a)(14) of the federal Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention Act of 1974.

(6) establish a process for providing notice and fair hearings required under [section 9] [41-5-1003, renumbered 41-5-1903] in order to terminate state grants to counties that fail to attain compliance or substantial compliance with the Montana Youth Court Act."

County Reimbursement by Board of Crime Control for Indian Youth Placed in Regional Detention Facility by Tribal Court: Title 18, ch. 11, the State-Tribal Cooperative Agreements Act, includes broad authority for counties to enter into agreements with tribes for the delivery of services to their citizens. Although tribes have jurisdiction over tribal member youth, those youth remain citizens of Montana as well as citizens of the tribes, and if the tribes do not provide services, such as youth detention facilities, those tribal youth are nevertheless entitled to be offered state services in the same manner as any other Montana youth. The fact that a tribal court adjudicates the youth does not necessarily disqualify the youth from the receipt of state services. In the present case, Blaine County entered into an agreement with the Fort Belknap Tribe to allow detention in the Blaine County youth detention facility of youth determined by the tribal court to be in need of detention, and Blaine County included the tribal youth population in its survey of youth to be served. The youth detention services were appropriately covered in the county's grant application. Thus, when the county applies for reimbursement for each youth served, regardless of whether the youth is a tribal member or not, the Montana Board of Crime Control is required to reimburse the county for detention costs for the youth, including tribal youth served in a regional detention facility pursuant to an order of a tribal court. 49 A.G. Part 25
Criminally Convicted Youth Act

Part Compiler's Comments

Effective Date: This part is effective October 1, 1999.

Part Case Notes

Youth Tried, Convicted, and Sentenced Under Transfer Statute Correctly Sentenced as Persistent Felony Offender: In 1999, when Mainwaring was a juvenile, he pleaded guilty to mitigated deliberate homicide and was convicted pursuant to 41-5-206 and sentenced pursuant to 41-5-2503(1)(a). A part of that sentence was later suspended under 41-5-2510. Later, shortly after turning 21, Mainwaring assaulted a child. The state brought assault charges against Mainwaring and then sought to have the court designate Mainwaring as a persistent felony offender (PFO). The District Court approved the designation as a PFO, based on Mainwaring's 1999 felony conviction, and Mainwaring was convicted and sentenced to 20 years in prison. The Supreme Court held that a conviction under 41-5-206(6) was equivalent to any adult felony conviction and that there is nothing in the Montana Youth Court Act or the Criminally Convicted Youth Act that precludes the application of the PFO statutes and designation to an individual previously convicted of a felony when the individual was a youth. Citing St. v. Damon, 2005 MT 218, 328 M 276, 119 P3d 1194 (2005), the Supreme Court held that the District Court therefore had the authority to apply the PFO statutes and designation to Mainwaring. The Supreme Court also overruled Mainwaring's due process objections and affirmed his conviction. St. v. Mainwaring, 2007 MT 14, 335 M 322, 151 P3d 53 (2007).

41-5-2503. Disposition of criminally convicted youth.

Case Notes

No Statutory Indication That Youth Received Illegal Sentence Following Transfer of Case to District Court: At the age of 17, Strong was charged with two counts of felony burglary, and the state moved to transfer the charges to District Court. The state also filed theft charges against Strong in Youth Court. Strong entered a guilty plea on the burglary charges in exchange for dismissal of the theft charges. The District Court sentenced Strong to the Department of Corrections for 8 years, with 2 years suspended on each count. While serving the prison term, Strong challenged the sentence as illegal because the District Court failed to suspend all but 5 years. The state countered that the 5-year limitation in 46-18-201(3)(d) did not apply to a youth who was transferred to District Court under 41-5-206. The District Court affirmed the original sentence and Strong appealed. Applying the criteria in St. v. Ellis, 2007 MT 210, 339 M 14, 167 P3d 896 (2007), the Supreme Court addressed the facial challenge to the exemption in 46-18-201(3)(d)(ii) and affirmed. In order for an adult to receive the less onerous commitment to the Department of Corrections, the sentencing court must be willing to suspend all but 5 years of the commitment, but the statute imposes no similar impediment on a court's ability to commit to the Department a youth transferred to District Court under 41-5-206. This enhanced flexibility with regard to the treatment of youth offenders comports with the goals of the Youth Court Act to ensure rehabilitation of youth offenders rather than solely retribution. Therefore, nothing in 46-18-201(3)(d)(ii) established that Strong received an illegal sentence. St. v. Strong, 2009 MT 65, 349 M 417, 203 P3d 848 (2009). 2003 Amendment: Chapter 194 substituted new Interstate Compact on Juveniles for former Interstate Compact on Juveniles (see 2003 Session Law for former text); and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective on occurrence of contingency.

1989 Amendment: Inserted Article XVI concerning rendition.

Attorney General's Opinions

Nondelinquent Youth Charged With Crime in Another State: Because Montana has not adopted Art. XVIII of the Interstate Compact on Juveniles, which provides that the Compact applies to juveniles charged with being delinquent by reason of violation of any criminal law, a youth who has not run away, escaped, or been adjudged delinquent is outside the scope of the Interstate Compact on Juveniles in Montana. A juvenile residing in Montana, and charged with a crime in another state, may be extradited under the Uniform Criminal Extradition Act, Title 46, ch. 30. The soundest policy is to extradite any juvenile charged with a crime in another state, regardless of whether a juvenile court or an adult court has final jurisdiction. 41 A.G. Op. 24 (1985).

41-6-105. Responsibilities of courts, state departments, agencies, and officers.

Case Notes

Jurisdiction Over Runaway Juvenile: The broad language of 41-6-105 granting the courts of Montana the authority to "do all things appropriate" to carry out the purposes of the Interstate Compact on Juveniles should include the power to place a runaway youth in a private home on determining that the juvenile should not be returned to the requisitioning state. Here, the juvenile properly filed a petition for protection of the court, as a youth in need of care, and later changed it to request placement with her grandparents, so that the District Court properly had jurisdiction. In re Pierce, 184 M 82, 601 P2d 1179 (1979).

Part Compiler's Comments

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 98, L. 1993, provided: "WHEREAS, the family is the basic institution in society through which our children's sense of well-being and self-esteem are developed and nurtured; and

WHEREAS, because our entire society benefits when families function well, it is in society's best interest to ensure that public policies and programs support and strengthen family life; and

WHEREAS, in fiscal year 1992, 3,310 Montana children and youth were removed from their families and placed in foster homes, group homes, and residential treatment facilities at a cost to the state of more than $16 million; and

WHEREAS, because of the high level of expenditures required to provide out-of-home placement, many experts now question whether public revenue spent for room, board, and related costs might be more wisely spent providing services specifically needed to enable a family to continue functioning as a family; and

WHEREAS, mounting evidence demonstrates that efforts that are made to support and strengthen vulnerable families before a crisis occurs can substantially contribute to family health and stability and prevent future long-term governmental costs; and

WHEREAS, because even with a reformed service system for families, some parents will not be available or able to protect or care adequately for their children, a range of out-of-home services should be available for these children and their families; and

WHEREAS, state and local policymakers increasingly are examining entire state systems for serving troubled children and families and are developing a more comprehensive approach to the multifaceted problems they face; and

WHEREAS, just as families nurture and sustain their members, healthy communities do the same for their member children and families; and

WHEREAS, because family services should be rooted in local communities and reflect local needs, characteristics, and resources, services should be provided as close as possible to the home community of the child or family and families should be fully involved in the planning and delivery of those services; and

WHEREAS, promoting family well-being and assuring children's safety must be the concern of all community sectors."

TITLE 42
ADOPTION

Title Compiler's Comments

Source: Some of the sections in chapters 1 through 7 of this title are based upon the Uniform Adoption Act, adopted by the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws in 1994 and found in 9 U.L.A. 1 (pocket part). The 1994 version of the Uniform Adoption Act has been enacted only in Vermont. In Montana, fewer than two dozen of the 115 sections of the 1994 Uniform Adoption Act have been enacted in whole or in part in this title. For that reason, the Commissioners' prefatory note to the 1994 Uniform Adoption Act has not been included because most of that note is inapplicable to the few 1994 Uniform Adoption Act sections included in this title. For the sections in this title in which all or a large part of the sections of the 1994 Uniform Adoption Act is like the Montana enactment and the comments of the Commissioners, if any, are therefore helpful, the Commissioners' comments accompanying the sections of the 1994 Uniform Adoption Act enacted in Montana are included under the catchline "1994 Commissioners' Comment", the section of the 1994 Uniform Adoption Act from which the Montana language is derived is cited under the heading "Compiler's Comments" as the "Source", and any differences between the 1994 Uniform Adoption Act and the version of the particular section of the 1994 Uniform Act enacted in Montana are explained under the heading "Compiler's Comments" and the catchline "Changes From 1994 Uniform Act". Even for many of those sections of the 1994 Uniform Adoption Act enacted in Montana, the Montana sections contain variations, omissions, and additional matter. For those sections that resemble the 1994 Uniform Adoption Act only in some minor way and for which the comments of the Commissioners, if any, are therefore unhelpful, the 1994 Commissioners' comments to the Uniform Act have not been included and the 1994 Uniform Act is not cited as the source, but similarities between the language of the 1994 Uniform Act and the statutory section are noted under the compiler's comments catchline "Similarities With 1994 Uniform Act".

Some sections of this title are also based upon former Title 40, ch. 8, repealed by Ch. 480, L. 1997. Title 40, ch. 8, enacted part of the 1953 Uniform Adoption Act. Montana never enacted the 1969 Revised Uniform Adoption Act. In those instances in which all or a major part of a section of the 1953 Uniform Adoption Act was enacted in Montana, the appropriate section of the 1953 Uniform Act is cited as the source, with or without changes, and any Commissioners' comments published with the 1953 Uniform Adoption Act have been retained under the catchline "1953 Commissioners' Comment", even though changes to the 1953 Act, as previously adopted in Montana, may have been made by Ch. 480, L. 1997. If no Commissioners' comment, source note, or comparison to the 1994 Uniform Act is provided, the compiler has made the judgment that any resemblance of the Montana statute to either the 1953 Uniform Act or the 1994 Uniform Act is so small that the inclusion of any comparison or source note would not be helpful to the reader and in fact may be misleading.

Some of the sections in this title are also based upon former sections of Title 40, ch. 6, the Montana version of the Uniform Parentage Act, 9B U.L.A. 287, which have been repealed or amended by Ch. 480, L. 1997. When meaningful parts of Title 40, ch. 6, have been retained, although amended, applicable portions of the Commissioners' comments to the Uniform Parentage Act that were originally published for the repealed sections have also been retained under the catchline "Commissioners' Comment" and the appropriate section of the Uniform Parentage Act is cited as the source.

Chapter 8 of this title concerning licensing of adoption agencies succeeded Title 52, ch. 2, part 4, repealed by sec. 171, Ch. 480, L. 1997. When appropriate, annotations formerly published for Title 52, ch. 2, part 4, have been transferred to chapter 8 of this title.

Chapter 10 of this title concerning subsidized adoptions was transferred from Title 52, ch. 2, part 5, by the Code Commissioner pursuant to sec. 174, Ch. 480, L. 1997. Because the MCA sections were transferred as a whole to this title, all annotations previously published for Title 52, ch. 2, part 5, were also transferred as a whole to this title.

Chapter Compiler's Comments

1997 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 480, L. 1997, provided: "A statement of intent is required for this bill because the bill gives the department of public health and human services authority to adopt administrative rules. The rules must provide procedures for the putative father registry, including methods of notification, filing, and accessing information. The department shall adopt rules for licensing child-placing agencies. To the extent feasible, the rules should incorporate existing procedures. The needs of the child in the adoption proceeding must be the primary focus of the rules."

Severability: Section 172, Ch. 480, L. 1997, was a severability clause.

Applicability: Section 173, Ch. 480, L. 1997 provided: "(1) [Sections 1 through 156] [Title 42, chapters 1 through 7, and Title 52, chapter 8, part 1] apply to proceedings commenced on or after October 1, 1997.

(2) A petition for adoption filed prior to October 1, 1997, is governed by the law in effect at the time the petition was filed.

(3) The putative father registry requirements apply to children born on or after October 1, 1997."

Effective Date: Section 177, Ch. 480, L. 1997, provided: "(1) Except as provided in subsection (2), [this act] is effective October 1, 1997.

(2) [Sections 19 through 26, 28 through 38, 60, 65, 67, 68, and 75] [42-2-202 through 42-2-209, 42-2-214 through 42-2-218, 42-2-222 through 42-2-226, 42-2-230, 42-2-503, 42-2-604, 42-2-605, 42-2-606, and 42-2-611] are effective October 1, 1998."

DECISIONS AFTER 1997 GENERAL REVISION

Postadoption Visitation Agreement — District Court Responsibilities: The District Court did not err when it modified sua sponte the parties' postadoption visitation agreement to provide weekend visitation and weekly telephone contact with the birth mother because the modification was determined to be in the best interests of the child. The finding was supported by substantial evidence, and the court did not misapprehend the effect of the evidence. Adoptive parents do not have sole discretion in deciding whether a postadoption visitation agreement should be enforced. Rather, the adoptive parents' wishes are but one factor among many to be considered in determining the child's best interests under 40-4-212. Groves v. Clark, 1999 MT 117, 294 M 417, 982 P2d 446, 56 St. Rep. 490 (1999).

Sua Sponte Modification of Postadoption Visitation Agreement Within Discretion of District Court: The rule that in the context of separation agreements made between spouses, parties cannot make binding agreements concerning the support, custody, or visitation of children applies equally to postadoption agreements made between an adopted child's birth parents and adoptive parents. The best interests of the child are paramount, and sua sponte modification of an original visitation agreement in this case was within the discretion of the District Court after determining the best interests of the adopted child. DECISIONS PRIOR TO 1997 GENERAL REVISION

Postadoption Visitation Agreement Between Natural Mother and Adoptive Parents — Responsibilities of District Court: Groves consented to the adoption of her child by the Clarks on the condition that the Clarks sign a visitation agreement allowing Groves to have specified contact with her daughter. After the document was signed and the adoption completed, the Clarks tried to terminate Groves' contact with her daughter. Groves brought an action for specific performance of the visitation agreement, but the District Court held that the agreement was void from its inception under 40-8-125 (now repealed). The Supreme Court reversed, holding that In re C.P., 221 M 180, 717 P2d 1093 (1986), was distinguishable and that the Legislature would not have enacted 40-8-136 (now repealed) if 40-8-125 (now repealed) terminated the interests of the natural parent altogether. The Supreme Court also noted that 40-8-136 (now repealed) also places a burden upon the adoptive parents and, in this case, upon the adoption agency that acted as Groves' agent, to make sure that the visitation agreement was filed in accordance with that statute. The Supreme Court also concluded that under 40-8-114 (now repealed), the District Court has a responsibility to make sure that the enforcement is in the best interests of the child. Groves v. Clark, 277 M 179, 920 P2d 981, 53 St. Rep. 703 (1996).

Procedures to Be Rigorously Followed: While there is some overlap in the various statutory schemes governing the termination of parental rights and the custody of children as to general subject matter, each is used for a distinct purpose and sets forth specific procedures which must be rigorously followed before a valid judgment or order may be issued, to insure that the minors involved receive the full protection of these laws. Case Notes

Criteria for Intervention in Adoption Proceeding — Unfounded and Untimely Motion to Intervene Properly Denied: Couple A adopted a child through a judicial decree in the District Court of the Twenty-First Judicial District. Couple B also wanted to adopt the child and filed a motion, in the District Court of the Twelfth Judicial District where they lived, to intervene and set aside the final decree of adoption, despite the fact that some 6 months had passed since the final adoption decree was issued. Initially, neither District Court was aware of the competing adoption petitions. The Department of Public Health and Human Services had been reviewing both couples as potential adoptive resources at the same time and ultimately determined that because the child had formed a strong bond during placement with couple A for nearly 2 years, it would be in the child's best interests to be adopted by couple A. Couple B contended that the child was a member of their extended family and that the Department should have given them priority as adoptive parents. The Twenty-First District Court held that couple B had no standing to intervene as a matter of right pursuant to former Rule 24(a), M.R.Civ.P. (now superseded), and that permissive intervention under former Rule 24(b), M.R.Civ.P. (now superseded), was untimely and would undermine the purpose of adoption to the detriment of the child. Couple B's motion to set aside the final decree pursuant to former Rule 60(b), M.R.Civ.P. (now superseded), was also denied on grounds that as nonparties to couple A's adoption petition, couple B had no standing to make the motion and that, in any case, it was untimely because it was made more than 180 days after the final decree. Couple B appealed the denial of both motions, arguing first that they had a legal interest by virtue of the family placement preference in the Indian Child Welfare Act (ICWA) and legislative and Departmental policies favoring adoptive placement with extended family members. The Supreme Court noted that a mere claim of interest is insufficient to support intervention as a matter of right and that a party seeking intervention must make a prima facie showing of a direct, substantial, legally protectable interest in the proceedings. No such showing was made here because the child was not Indian and therefore not subject to the ICWA, nor did the relationship of second cousins meet the definition of extended family member. Couple B next argued that they should have been allowed to intervene under the permissive standard of former Rule 24(b), M.R.Civ.P., because the competing adoption petitions had common issues of law and fact. Couple B contended that their delay should be excused by their reliance on misrepresentations made by the Department. The Supreme Court agreed that the Department could have taken a more forthright approach and saved all the parties considerable time and expense, but couple B bore the responsibility for ensuring the timely filing of the motion to intervene. The Supreme Court noted that timeliness is a threshold issue when intervention is sought and that, although none of the factors are dispositive, most courts look to four factors in considering whether a motion to intervene is timely filed: (1) the length of time that the intervenor knew or should have known of its interest in the case before moving to intervene; (2) prejudice to the original parties, if intervention is granted, resulting from the intervenor's delay; (3) prejudice to the intervenor if the motion is denied; and (4) any unusual circumstances mitigating for or against a determination that the application is timely. The Supreme Court considered each factor in detail. Although the third factor weighed in favor of couple B, because denial of the motion to intervene effectively precluded any hope of their adoption of the child, the other factors weighed strongly against them. The District Court made a reasoned analysis when it determined that the motion to intervene was untimely and did not abuse its discretion in denying the motion. Last, because couple B did not address the threshold issues of former Rule 60(b), M.R.Civ.P., on appeal, the Supreme Court concluded that denial of the motion to set aside the final adoption decree on grounds of standing and timeliness was proper. DECISIONS PRIOR TO 1997 GENERAL REVISION

Jurisdiction Based on Presence of Child in Montana: In a case in which the natural parents were residents of Wyoming but the child was born in Montana and present in Montana, the District Court had jurisdiction in an action to terminate parental rights under the abuse and neglect statutes, based on the presence of the child in Montana. In re Parental Rights of Baby Girl W., 249 M 206, 814 P2d 976, 48 St. Rep. 643 (1991).

No Requirement That Jurisdiction of Dissolution Proceedings Also Be Adoption Venue: A petition for adoption was filed in the same judicial district as the parents' dissolution of marriage but did not come before the same judge. The father argued that only the court having jurisdiction over the dissolution proceedings should be able to consider a petition to terminate his parental rights. The Supreme Court found no such jurisdictional requirement under 40-8-107 (now repealed). In re Adoption of S.E., 232 M 31, 755 P2d 27, 45 St. Rep. 843 (1988).

Venue Determined by Filing of Adoption Petition: Where adoption petition was filed in District Court of Lincoln County, State Welfare Department (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) was ordered to investigate petitioners' home and to file a report, and the Department did file such report to the court after which it filed petition in District Court of Missoula County to have the child, who had been taken from Lincoln County and placed in a foster home in Missoula County, declared dependent and neglected and to award permanent custody to the Department, jurisdiction was in the District Court in Lincoln County, and District Court in Missoula County did not have jurisdiction and would be required to dismiss the petition before it. State ex rel. Habeck v. District Court, 157 M 231, 484 P2d 272 (1971).

Jurisdiction: Section 40-8-107 (now repealed) relates to venue and not jurisdiction; even though only one of joint petitioners in an adoption proceeding was resident of county in which proceeding was held, that was sufficient to confer jurisdiction. DECISIONS AFTER 1997 GENERAL REVISION

Stepparent's Petition to Terminate Biological Parent's Parental Rights Granted Given Evidence of Abandonment: A custodial stepparent has standing to petition for termination of a noncustodial parent's parental rights. In this case, the custodial stepmother petitioned for and was granted termination of the noncustodial mother's rights in order to allow for adoption of the child by the stepmother. The mother appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. The District Court concluded that the mother abandoned the child and thus was an unfit parent. As evidence of abandonment, the court did not err in considering: (1) the mother's time in prison and residential drug treatment, during which she had no contact with the child; (2) during the mother's periods of absence, the mother's struggle with an abusive relationship, use of illegal drugs, and associations with known criminals; (3) the mother's failure to follow through on commitments to care for and visit the child; and (4) a lack of intent on the mother's part to resume care of the child in the future, regardless of any understanding that an initial parenting plan was temporary. Evidence of abandonment was substantial, and the District Court did not err in granting the petition to terminate the mother's parental rights. Rights and Obligations of Stepfather — Equitable Adoption Not Recognized: Pierce sought custody of his spouse's child in connection with a dissolution of marriage. Pierce never formally adopted the child, but argued that an equitable adoption existed giving him standing to seek custody. The court reaffirmed the law that equitable adoption is not recognized in Montana. To adopt a child, the correct statutory procedures must be followed, and followed rigorously. Pierce had no standing to contest the custody of the child, nor had he any obligation to that child. Pierce v. Pierce, 198 M 255, 645 P2d 1353, 39 St. Rep. 914 (1982).

DECISIONS AFTER 1997 GENERAL REVISION

Mistake of Law — Aunt and Uncle Lack Standing to Petition for Termination of Parental Rights: In a case involving termination of parental rights, the Supreme Court assumed supervisory control to determine whether G.R. and P.R., the child's aunt and uncle, had standing to bring the amended petition to terminate parental rights and for adoption. A child's aunt and uncle are not parties authorized by 42-1-107 to place a child for adoption. A child may not be placed for adoption until the parental rights of the birth parents have been terminated by a court as provided in Title 41, chapter 3, or Title 42. G.R. and P.R. did not have standing to file a petition for termination of parental rights under 42-2-603(2). Under Title 41, chapter 3, a petition for the termination of parental right based upon abuse or neglect of a child may only be brought by the County Attorney, the Attorney General, or an attorney hired by the county. Section 40-6-233 refers to the abuse of parental authority for making decisions regarding the support and education of a child and is not the basis for terminating parental rights. Therefore, G.R. and P.R.

do not have standing to petition for the termination of parental rights based upon abuse or neglect. J.C. v. Eleventh Judicial District Court, 2008 MT 358, 346 M 357, 197 P3d 907 (2008).

No Standing by Former Parent to Object to Child's Placement or Assert Child's Rights: Once the parent-child relationship is terminated by the District Court, a former parent has no standing to object to the court's subsequent placement of the child with the Department or by adoption. Similarly, a former parent has no standing to assert a violation of the child's rights as guardian ad litem because the former parent no longer represents the child. In re E.A.T. & T.A.T., 1999 MT 281, 296 M 535, 989 P2d 860, 56 St. Rep. 1133 (1999).

DECISIONS PRIOR TO 1997 GENERAL REVISION

Absence of Department Adoption Placement and Written Consent by Department Head — Adoption Order Improper: Under 40-8-108 (now repealed), a court is not included in the list of entities that may place a child for adoption. Therefore, it was improper for a District Court to order a child's placement in the absence of a placement for adoption by the appropriate state agency and the written consent to adoption executed by the executive head of the Department. In re F.H., 272 M 342, 901 P2d 96, 52 St. Rep. 791 (1995). See also In re Adoption of Hall, 173 M 142, 566 P2d 401 (1977).

Award of Permanent Legal Custody — Authority of Court to Award Custody — Best Interests of Child Standard: The Department of Family Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) filed a petition requesting the court to terminate parental rights of Mary Ann G. and to grant the Department permanent legal custody of J.J.G., with the right to consent to adoption. Former foster parents of J.J.G. filed a petition seeking permanent custody of the child. The court dismissed the foster parents' petition on grounds that the court could only review the placement actions of the Department but could not make the permanent placement itself. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that the lower court erred when it concluded that the foster parents were without legal authority to seek custody of the child and that the lower court had no option other than to grant custody to the Department. The District Court has discretionary authority to transfer legal custody to any qualified individual, including nonrelatives, in order to protect the welfare of the child. In re J.J.G., 266 M 274, 880 P2d 808, 51 St. Rep. 793 (1994), followed in In re E.A.T. & T.A.T., 1999 MT 281, 296 M 535, 989 P2d 860, 56 St. Rep. 1133 (1999).

Attorney General's Opinions

Placement for Adoption: No person, including a physician or an attorney, may assist in procuring or selecting an adoptive home for a minor child, even if requested by the child's natural parents, unless licensed as a child-placing agency under 53-4-402 (renumbered 52-2-402, now repealed). 42 A.G. Op. 9 (1987).

42-1-108. Rights and responsibilities of parties in adoption proceedings.

Case Notes

Adoption Void When Parental Rights of Minor Without Legal Representation Relinquished: A mother was 17 years old when she sought to have her child adopted, but misrepresented herself as being 18 years old. After the adoption was completed, the mother sought to set it aside. The District Court held that because the mother was a minor when she relinquished her parental rights and was not represented by counsel as required by 42-2-405, the adoption was void. The adoptive parents appealed on various grounds, including a contention that it was in the child's best interests to be returned to them because the child had a right to permanence and stability in the adoptive placement. The Supreme Court affirmed. Section 42-2-405 exists to protect minor parents from making legally binding direct parental placement adoptions without counsel's advice and representation, and the District Court correctly concluded that it had no authority to order relinquishment of the mother's parental rights when she had no legal representation. The adoptive parents' argument that the child should be returned based on the child's best interests also failed because the child had been returned to the mother more than 1 year earlier. In re Adoption of A.L.O., 2006 MT 59, 331 M 334, 132 P3d 543 (2006).

CHAPTER 2
ADOPTION OF CHILD

Chapter Official Comments

It is the theory of this act that the adoption proceedings should be based on consent. Only then can the adoption court devote its entire attention to the inquiry whether the adoptive home will serve the best interests of the child and whether the child is properly placed in the adoptive home.

Under this theory controversies respecting the termination of parental rights should be settled in other proceedings in a court with jurisdiction of the parties before the adoption proceedings are brought. Once the parental rights are terminated the adoption court in the adoption proceedings has no other function in this respect except to recognize that the parental rights have been legally terminated by consent or by the order of a court of competent jurisdiction, followed by consent of a person, agency or court having authority to consent.

It has been suggested that a procedure should be provided in the adoption act to terminate parental rights where the consent cannot be obtained. Aside from the jurisdictional and procedural difficulties this would entail, it is subject to a basic policy objection. The issues to be tried in a controversy over the termination of parental rights, i e., the degree of unfitness of a parent, are quite different than the inquiry properly before an adoption court. The two should not be mixed. The trial of controversial issues over parental rights should not cast an influence in the adoption proceedings where the sole inquiry should be the future best interests of the child.

Consequently, the determination of parental rights is left to be settled under the laws of the various states, and until terminated, by consent or by a court order in a court having jurisdiction of the parties under laws providing therefor, there can be no adoption proceedings.

The formalities, other than writing, which should be required in respect to the execution of consents in the instances covered by paragraphs (1) and (2) [42-2-301(1) and (2), 42-2-302, and 42-2-608(1)] are subjects on which opinions differ widely and it does not seem that uniformity is essential. Accordingly, the bracketing in the last paragraph of the section has been used to indicate that the matter is left open and to suggest, without limitation, certain options that may commend themselves to legislative authority.

1994 Commissioners' Comment: The provisions of the Indian Child Welfare Act (ICWA), including the provisions that determine whether a tribal or a state court has exclusive or concurrent jurisdiction, preempt this Act whenever an adoptive placement, a consent or relinquishment, a proceeding to terminate parental rights, or an adoption proceeding pertains to an "Indian child." The ICWA defines "Indian child" as an unmarried individual under 18 who is either a member of an Indian tribe or eligible for membership by virtue of being the biological child of a tribal member; 25 U.S.C. §1903(3). A parent or guardian executing a consent or relinquishment under this Act must state that the minor adoptee is not within ICWA's definition of Indian child, Section 2-406(d)(5) [not enacted in Montana], and the court, when granting an adoption, has to indicate if ICWA is applicable to the proceeding, and if so, that its requirements were met. See Section 3-703(a)(8) [not enacted in Montana].

DECISIONS AFTER 1997 GENERAL REVISION

Failure of District Court to Determine Indian Status of Children Prior to Termination of Parental Rights Warranting Reversal: Absent a conclusive determination from the affected tribes, it was reversible error for the District Court to terminate a mother's parental rights without definitely resolving the threshold question of whether the children were Indian children within the meaning of the Indian Child Welfare Act. In this case, the District Court was presented with insufficient evidence regarding the children's status because of the mother's failure to present crucial evidence regarding the children's possible tribal affiliation and the tribe's delay in intervening. However, the tribe's right to intervene was not impaired by the delay, and the court should not have proceeded absent a conclusive determination that the children were not tribal members. In re A.G., W.G., T.A., & J.A., 2005 MT 81, 326 M 403, 109 P3d 756 (2005).

Standards Applicable to Termination of Indian Parental Rights — Active Department Efforts to Provide Services Required: The District Court terminated the parental rights of an Indian father after the children were removed from the father's custody a fourth time because of the father's abuse and neglect. The father appealed on grounds that: (1) the state did not make active efforts to provide remedial services; (2) the District Court relied on expert testimony based on the Department file rather than personal interviews; and (3) it was error not to grant the father's request for an extension of temporary legal custody. The Supreme Court affirmed on all issues. The father left no phone number or address with the social worker and moved multiple times. Without any involvement, the father prevented the Department from making active efforts at providing more intensive services. Second, the federal Indian Child Welfare Act requires testimony from a qualified expert witness, but does not require a specific form of that testimonial evidence or personal interviews, and a District Court need not conform its decision to a particular piece of evidence or a particular expert's report or testimony as long as a reasonable person could have found beyond a reasonable doubt that continued custody by an Indian parent or custodian is likely to result in serious emotional or physical damage to the child. Last, the District Court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to extend temporary custody because the Department had already provided active efforts and did not need more time to assist the father in attaining his goals. The District Court had an accurate perspective on the father's parenting abilities, and refusal to extend the temporary placement did not make the court's decision any less reasonable. In re A.N. & M.N., 2005 MT 19, 325 M 379, 106 P3d 556 (2005). See also In re Marriage of McKenna, 2000 MT 58, 299 M 13, 996 P2d 386 (2000).

Sufficient Evidence That ICWA Standards Met in Terminating Parental Rights — Termination Affirmed Absent Abuse of Discretion: An Indian father contended that the state did not present sufficient evidence under the federal Indian Child Welfare Act of 1978 (ICWA) to warrant termination of his parental rights. The Supreme Court determined that: (1) there was sufficient evidence that continued custody of the children was likely to result in serious emotional or physical damage to the children; (2) the evidence was supported by testimony from qualified experts; (3) active but unsuccessful efforts had been made to provide remedial services and rehabilitative programs to prevent the breakup of the Indian family; and (4) the children had lived in foster care a sufficient time to create the presumption under 41-3-604 that the children's best interests would be served by terminating parental rights. The ICWA requirements having been followed, parental rights were properly terminated. In re S.R., R.R., & G.R. Jr., 2004 MT 227, 322 M 424, 97 P3d 559 (2004).

Beyond a Reasonable Doubt Standard Not Cited but Applied in ICWA Parental Rights Termination Case — No Error: In a case subject to the Indian Child Welfare Act (ICWA), the mother contended that the District Court improperly applied a standard of what was likely rather than the beyond a reasonable doubt standard of proof. The Supreme Court disagreed. In making the determination that the mother would likely cause serious emotional or physical damage if the child was returned to her, the District Court was mirroring the language in 25 U.S.C. 1912(f). Further, the federal statute does not require that a state court specifically cite the beyond a reasonable doubt standard of proof, but only that the court's determination be supported by evidence beyond a reasonable doubt, and the court did apply the correct standard of proof in this case. In re M.R.G., 2004 MT 172, 322 M 60, 97 P3d 1085 (2004), following In re M.D.M., 2002 MT 305, 313 M 51, 59 P3d 1142 (2002).

Unsuccessful Treatment Plan, Remedial Services, and Rehabilitative Program — Indian Parental Rights Properly Terminated: The District Court terminated the parental rights of an Indian mother. On appeal, the mother contended that the court's determination that the child would suffer serious emotional or physical damage if the child was returned to her was not proved beyond a reasonable doubt. The Supreme Court noted that state law requires successful completion of a parenting plan and that the federal Indian Child Welfare Act requires that active efforts be made to provide remedial services and rehabilitative programs to prevent the breakup of an Indian family, but that in this case, both the state and federal measures proved unsuccessful. The District Court received substantial testimony from qualified cultural and other experts upon which it could conclude beyond a reasonable doubt that the prospect of the mother providing primary care was likely to subject the child to serious harm, so the mother's parental rights were properly terminated. In re M.R.G., 2004 MT 172, 322 M 60, 97 P3d 1085 (2004).

Insufficient Good Cause to Allow Deviation From Adoption Placement Standards of Indian Child Welfare Act: When the Indian child in this matter was 12 weeks old, she was admitted to the hospital with 16 fractured ribs in various stages of healing and several bruises. The attending physician determined that the injuries were a result of abuse, and the child was placed in foster care with a non-Indian family. The District Court held that the child's extraordinary physical and emotional needs constituted good cause to deviate from the Indian Child Welfare Act of 1978 (ICWA) placement provisions regarding adoptive placement with tribal extended family members. The District Court decided that the federal statutory factors were merely examples rather than an exhaustive list of circumstances of good cause and instead applied the Montana best interests of the child standard, concluding that nine extraordinary physical and emotional needs existed, including the child's strong emotional bond with the non-Indian foster family, that warranted deviation from the ICWA. The Supreme Court reversed, finding that the District Court's conclusion was an incorrect application of the law. The ICWA guidelines in 25 U.S.C. 1915(a) provide that a determination of good cause to avoid the placement preferences must be based on one or more of three stated factors, which are the only circumstances constituting good cause. The ICWA guidelines will be strictly applied and liberally construed in favor of a result that is consistent with the preferences in that Act. The emotional attachment between a non-Indian custodian and an Indian child does not necessarily outweigh the interests of the tribe and the child in having the child raised in an Indian community, nor does the child's emotional attachment to foster parents constitute an extraordinary emotional need sufficient to establish good cause to avoid the ICWA placement preferences. In re C.H., 2000 MT 64, 299 M 62, 997 P2d 776, 57 St. Rep. 300 (2000). See also In re Custody of S.E.G., 521 NW 2d 357 (Minn. 1994).

Waiver of Indian Child Welfare Act by Failure of Tribe to Intervene Prior to Termination of Proceeding: In an action by the state to terminate the parental rights of an Indian parent and to place the child, eligible for tribal enrollment, in foster care, the tribe was notified from the outset of the proposed action and did not intervene for a transfer of jurisdiction until after the proceeding had been completed in the state court. The Supreme Court held that although the state proceeding was required by federal law to be transferred to tribal court upon intervention of the tribe, the tribe, when it had notice of the proceeding, had to intervene while there was still a proceeding pending, otherwise the tribe would be considered to have declined transfer of jurisdiction. In re A.P., 1998 MT 176, 289 M 521, 962 P2d 1186, 55 St. Rep. 715 (1998).

DECISIONS PRIOR TO 1997 GENERAL REVISION

No Waiver of Indian Child Welfare Act by Failure of Tribe to Promptly Intervene in Adoption — "Indian Child" Determinable by Tribal Action Following BIA Determination: The Department of Family Services (now the Department of Public Health and Human Services) notified the Turtle Mountain Band of Chippewa (the tribe) several times that the Department sought to terminate the parental rights to Jessica, a minor of one-eighth Indian blood. However, the tribe took no action. The parental rights were subsequently terminated, and the Department commenced adoption proceedings. Just prior to the District Court's determination of Jessica's custody, the tribe sought to intervene, but the District Court determined that the tribe had waived its right to intervention by the nearly 2-year period of inaction following notice by the state to the tribe. The Supreme Court held that there was no requirement in the Indian Child Welfare Act of 1978 that the tribe intervene promptly and that for this reason, the tribe should be allowed to intervene. The Supreme Court also held that the District Court was incorrect in concluding that it would make no difference what the tribe's position was on the issue of whether Jessica was an "Indian child" because the Bureau of Indian Affairs (BIA) decision could be impeached by action of the tribe either before or after the BIA determination. In re Adoption of Riffle, 273 M 237, 902 P2d 542, 52 St. Rep. 954 (1995). On remand, the District Court concluded that the tribe's determination that Jessica was an Indian child and a member of the tribe was conclusive and that the ICWA applied to Jessica's adoption. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that the tribe is the ultimate authority on eligibility for tribal membership and that enrollment of the child in the tribe was not required as long as the tribe recognized Jessica as a member. Enrollment is a common but not exclusive evidentiary means of determining membership in a tribe, but enrollment and membership are not synonymous. Given the tribe's determination that Jessica was an Indian child, the District Court properly concluded that the tribe's determination was conclusive and that the adoptive placement preferences found at 25 U.S.C. 1915 of the ICWA applied, including the placement preference with Jessica's uncle who met the definition of "extended family member". Jessica's best interests were served by placement with her uncle, and her constitutional rights were not violated through the application of the ICWA. In re Adoption of Riffle, 277 M 388, 922 P2d 510, 53 St. Rep. 723 (1996).

Applicability of Indian Child Welfare Act to Adoption Anonymity Considerations — Conformity With Act Required: Baby Girl Jane Doe was born at the Northern Montana Hospital in Havre. She was of Indian descent and eligible for membership in the Chippewa Cree Tribe on the Rocky Boy's Reservation. After the child's birth, her mother refused to sign the birth certificate, indicated her intent to relinquish the child to the Hill County Department of Family Services, and left the hospital. The Department filed for an order terminating parental rights and giving the Department the right to consent to the child's adoption. The tribe intervened and moved for disclosure of the mother's identity in order to ensure that any child placement conformed to the preferences provided in the federal Indian Child Welfare Act of 1978 (ICWA). The District Court denied the motion based on the mother's stated preference for anonymity. On appeal, the tribe asserted that its right to intervene and advocate enforcement of the ICWA was meaningless when the first preference under the ICWA is for placement with the child's extended family, yet the court would not reveal the identity of the natural parent. The Supreme Court cited Miss. Band of Choctaw Indians v. Holyfield, 490 US 30, 104 L Ed 2d 29, 109 S Ct 1597 (1989), in holding that, absent good cause to the contrary, the ICWA mandates that adoptive placements be made preferentially with: (1) members of the child's extended family; (2) other members of the same tribe; or (3) other Indian families. Permitting individual tribal members to avoid tribal exclusive jurisdiction by the simple expedient of giving birth off the reservation would to a large extent nullify the purpose of the ICWA. The Supreme Court reversed the District Court and ordered that the tribe be informed of the identity of the mother and her extended family, respecting her right to privacy to the extent possible without interfering with the tribe's rights under the ICWA. In re Baby Girl Jane Doe, 262 M 380, 865 P2d 1090, 50 St. Rep. 1555 (1993).

Exclusive Jurisdiction Over Indian Child Under Indian Child Welfare Act: Provisions of the Indian Child Welfare Act of 1978 (25 U.S.C. 1901, et seq.) concerning jurisdiction over Indian child custody proceedings place exclusive jurisdiction in the Indian tribe if an Indian child is a ward of the tribal court, regardless of the residence or domicile of the child. In this adoption proceeding, it was error on the part of the District Court to determine that Montana had concurrent jurisdiction over the child at issue because the tribal court previously had found her a ward of the tribal court. In re M.R.D.B., 241 M 455, 787 P2d 1219, 47 St. Rep. 303 (1990).

Right to Intervene in Adoption of Indian Child — State Commitment to Indian Child Welfare Act: Prior to birth, Nellie Silk, paternal aunt of M.E.M., expressed an interest in caring for the child because she was aware of the parents' problems with parenting; however, after the child was born he was placed in foster care by the Hill County Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (SRS). Upon learning of the placement, Silk wrote to SRS requesting custody. SRS responded that placement with Silk would be inappropriate because of SRS efforts to reintegrate the family, but that Silk would be considered if adoption were to occur. After parental rights were terminated (see In re M.E.M., 209 M 192, 679 P2d 1241, 41 St. Rep. 636 (1984)), Silk was not informed of the proceedings, of M.E.M.'s availability for adoption, or of M.E.M.'s preadoptive placement with a non-Indian family. Silk's subsequent petition for adoption and motion to intervene were denied by the District Court. On appeal, the Supreme Court found that Silk had an interest in adoption stemming from the Indian Child Welfare Act of 1978 (ICWA), 25 U.S.C. 1901, et seq., and that the state had a strong and independent commitment to the principles embodied in the ICWA. Silk also had a right to intervene under former Rule 24(a), M.R.Civ.P. (now superseded), and although the District Court had ruled that her motion was not timely, the Supreme Court held that the motion must be granted in light of the fact that she was kept in ignorance and could not have been more diligent or earlier in her petition or motion. In re M.E.M., 223 M 234, 725 P2d 212, 43 St. Rep. 1684 (1986), followed in In re Adoption of Riffle, 273 M 237, 902 P2d 542, 52 St. Rep. 954 (1995). See also In re K.H. & K.L.E., 1999 MT 128, 294 M 466, 981 P2d 1190, 56 St. Rep. 515 (1999).

Jurisdiction: When the adoptive parents, adopted child, and natural parent were enrolled members of the Northern Cheyenne Tribe and resided on its Reservation, the District Court had jurisdiction notwithstanding ordinance granting tribal court jurisdiction. State ex rel. Firecrow v. District Court, 167 M 139, 536 P2d 190 (1975), reversed in Fisher v. District Court, 424 US 382, 96 S Ct 943, 47 L Ed 2d 106 (1976), wherein it was held that the tribal court has exclusive subject matter jurisdiction over petition for adoption of minor Indian child by two Indian adults living on reservation.

Foster Care or Adoption Placement of Indian Children — No Department Payments Under Social Security Act: The Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) may not make payments under Title IV-E of the Social Security Act (42 U.S.C. 670 through 676) to Indian children whose foster care or adoption placement is subject to exclusive tribal jurisdiction under the Indian Child Welfare Act (25 U.S.C. 1901, et seq.). 41 A.G. Case Notes

DECISIONS AFTER 1997 GENERAL REVISION

Adoption of Children of Parent Whose Parental Rights Terminated Affirmed: The District Court terminated a father's parental rights for nonsupport and granted the stepfather's petition to adopt the children without the father's written permission. The father appealed. Although a child generally may not be adopted without the written consent of both birth parents, written consent is not required of a parent whose parental rights have been terminated, so the Supreme Court addressed whether the termination of parental rights was proper. In this case, the father was able to provide support for his children during an aggregate 1-year period prior to the filing of the adoption petition but failed to do so, rendering him an unfit parent pursuant to 42-2-608. Thus, the District Court did not err in terminating the father's parental rights. In re Adoption of C.W.D. & C.D.D. v. P.K.D., 2005 MT 145, 327 M 301, 114 P3d 214 (2005).

DECISIONS PRIOR TO 1997 GENERAL REVISION

Absence of Department Adoption Placement and Written Consent by Department Head — Adoption Order Improper: Under 40-8-108 (now repealed), a court is not included in the list of entities that may place a child for adoption. Therefore, it was improper for a District Court to order a child's placement in the absence of a placement for adoption by the appropriate state agency and the written consent to adoption executed by the executive head of the Department. In re F.H., 272 M 342, 901 P2d 96, 52 St. Rep. 791 (1995). See also In re Adoption of Hall, 173 M 142, 566 P2d 401 (1977).

Natural Father's Consent to Adoption Not Required When Evidence Clear He Abandoned Child: The father had only visited with his daughter twice and called her on the telephone twice in 8 years and during that time never paid support. The Supreme Court affirmed the lower court's finding that the record contained clear and convincing evidence that the natural father had willfully abandoned his daughter, and therefore his consent to the child's adoption by her grandparents was not required. Adoption of C.R.D., 240 M 106, 782 P2d 1280, 46 St. Rep. 1979 (1989).

Best Interest of Child:

If the statutory requirements for consent to adoption are met, the best interests of the child become the paramount consideration. In re Adoption of S.T.V., 226 M 18, 733 P2d 841, 44 St. Rep. 425 (1987).

In adoption cases the initial threshold requirement is statutory compliance with consent requirements because of the harshness of terminating parental rights. In re Adoption of Smigaj, 171 M 531, 560 P2d 141 (1977).

Part 4
Voluntary Relinquishment and Consent to Adopt

Part Official Comments

Subsection (a) [40-6-128, now repealed] provides that a father whose identity is presumed under Section 4 [40-6-105] or whose paternity has been formally ascertained, must be given notice of an adoption proceeding relating to his child.

Subsection (b) [40-6-128, now repealed] deals with the case in which the father has not been formally ascertained and the mother seeks to surrender the child for adoption. In the light of the U.S. Supreme Court's decisions in Stanley v. Illinois, 92 S.Ct. 1208 (1972); Rothstein v. Lutheran Social Services of Wisconsin and Upper Michigan, 92 S.Ct. 1488 (1972) and Vanderlaan v. Vanderlaan, 92 S.Ct. 1488 (1972) and related state court decisions, it is considered essential that the unknown or unascertained father's potential rights be terminated formally in order to safeguard the subsequent adoption.

Subsections (c) through (f) [40-6-126 through 40-6-129, now repealed] provide a procedure by which the court may ascertain the identity of the father and permit speedy termination of his potential rights if he shows no interest in the child. If, on the other hand, the natural father or a man representing himself to be the natural father claims custodial rights, the court is given authority to determine custodial rights. It is contemplated that there may be cases in which the man alleging himself to be the father is so clearly unfit to take custody of the child that the court would proceed to terminate his potential parental rights without deciding whether the man actually is the father of the child. If, on the other hand, the man alleging himself to be the father and claiming custody is prima facie fit to have custody of the child, an action to ascertain paternity is indicated, unless a voluntary acknowledgment can be obtained in accordance with Section 4(a) (5) [40-6-105(1) (e)] of this Act.

Subsection (e) [40-6-128, now repealed] raises serious constitutional questions in that it attempts to cut off after a given period any claim seeking to reopen a judgment terminating parental rights. While of questionable constitutionality, such a provision is not without precedent. A similar provision is contained in Section 15(b) of the revised Uniform Adoption Act, approved by the Commissioners on Uniform State Laws in 1969, and other similar provisions are contained in the adoption acts of a number of states. Moreover, it must be considered that the case of adoption differs from other situations. The parent's claim to his child can hardly be compared to a person's claim to property. The Supreme Court itself recognized that the interest of the child is heavily involved in these cases when remanding the Rothstein case to the Wisconsin Supreme Court, requiring that the court give "due consideration [to] the completion of the adoption proceedings and the fact that the child has apparently lived with the adoptive family for the intervening period of time." Cf. Armstrong v. Manzo, 380 U.S. 545 (1965).

Subsection (f) seeks to conform to the following footnote in Stanley v. Illinois:

"We note in passing that the incremental cost of offering unwed fathers an opportunity for individualized hearings on fitness appears to be minimal. If unwed fathers, in the main, do not care about the disposition of their children, they will not appear to demand hearings. If they do care, under the scheme here held invalid, Illinois would admittedly at some later time have to afford them a properly focused hearing in a custody or adopting proceeding.

Extending opportunity for hearing to unwed fathers who desire and claim competence to care for their children creates no constitutional or procedural obstacle to foreclosing those unwed fathers who are not so inclined. The Illinois law governing procedure in juvenile cases . . . provides for personal service, notice by certified mail or for notice by publication when personal or certified mail service cannot be had or when notice is directed to unknown respondents under the style of 'all whom it may concern.' Unwed fathers who do not promptly respond cannot complain if their children are declared wards of the State. Those who do respond retain the burden of proving their fatherhood."

This footnote might be interpreted to require publication in all cases in which a child with unascertained paternity is surrendered for adoption. The Committee considered, however, that there will be many such cases in which it will be highly probable that publication will not lead to the identification of the father. In view of that and the fact that in nearly all cases publication will lead to substantial embarrassment for the mother, the Committee thought it appropriate to allow the court to determine whether, in the particular circumstances of each case, publication would be likely to lead to the identification of the father. One serious consequence that might result from an indiscriminate publication requirement is that some mothers may be caused to withhold their children from adoption even where adoption would be in the child's best interest.

Case Notes

DECISIONS AFTER 1997 GENERAL REVISION

Preservation and Reunification Efforts Not Required in Involuntary Termination of Parental Rights: If a court involuntarily terminates a parent's rights under 41-3-609, the state may forego reasonable efforts to provide preservation or reunification services to that parent with regard to any future children placed with the state, pursuant to 41-3-423. Voluntary relinquishment is only one of several criteria that a court may consider when ordering termination of parental rights. In this case, the District Court properly terminated a mother's parental rights based in part on adjudication of the child as a youth in need of care. With the exception of minor immaterial misstatements, the court's decision was based on facts supported by substantial testimonial evidence from professionals, so termination of parental rights was not an abuse of discretion, and the decision was affirmed. Inapplicability to Dissolution Proceedings: Former section 40-6-135 (now repealed) related to relinquishment of parental rights in adoption situations and did not apply to marriage dissolution proceedings. In re Marriage of McKinnon, 251 M 347, 825 P2d 551, 49 St. Rep. 69 (1992).

Constitutionality — Contest of Voluntariness of Release: The natural mother argued that 40-6-124 (now repealed) required her to obtain the consent of the prospective adoptive parents before filing an action to set aside her parental release for involuntariness. This, she argued, effectively precluded her from contesting the validity of the parental release, thereby depriving her of due process of law. The court did not read 40-6-124 as prohibiting an action to contest the voluntariness of the release unless the consent of the person to whom the child has been released was first obtained. The procedure contained in subsection (7) was required only when there was no issue of voluntariness of the parental release. In re Adoption of B.G.B., 183 M 347, 599 P2d 375 (1979).

42-2-404. Who may relinquish — to whom.

Official Comments

1994 Commissioners' Comment: This section helps clarify the distinction between consents and relinquishments and between direct and agency placements. A parent or guardian who makes a direct placement of a minor for adoption must execute a consent for the adoption to go forward. If the parent or guardian prefers, instead, to have an agency place the minor and consent to the minor's adoption, the parent or guardian has to relinquish all rights with respect to the minor to the agency. From then on, the agency acts in lieu of the parent or guardian: it acquires custody of the minor and the authority to place the child for adoption pursuant to the procedures in Sections 2-103 and 2-104 [neither enacted in Montana]. An agency may also acquire the right to place the minor for adoption pursuant to a court order.

Case Notes

Adoption Void When Parental Rights of Minor Without Legal Representation Relinquished: A mother was 17 years old when she sought to have her child adopted, but misrepresented herself as being 18 years old. After the adoption was completed, the mother sought to set it aside. The District Court held that because the mother was a minor when she relinquished her parental rights and was not represented by counsel as required by this section, the adoption was void. The adoptive parents appealed on various grounds, including a contention that it was in the child's best interests to be returned to them because the child had a right to permanence and stability in the adoptive placement. The Supreme Court affirmed. This section exists to protect minor parents from making legally binding direct parental placement adoptions without counsel's advice and representation, and the District Court correctly concluded that it had no authority to order relinquishment of the mother's parental rights when she had no legal representation. The adoptive parents' argument that the child should be returned based on the child's best interests also failed because the child had been returned to the mother more than 1 year earlier. In re Adoption of A.L.O., 2006 MT 59, 331 M 334, 132 P3d 543 (2006).

WHEREAS, there are currently financial and other means of support for parents who choose to keep their children that are compelling parents of little means to keep their children; and

WHEREAS, the ability to provide similar forms of support to a parent who has chosen to relinquish a child in order to give the parent a chance to grieve and to assist the parent with counseling, temporary housing, mentoring services, job training, life skills development, budgeting and financial management, and educational opportunities will provide birth parents with another option that can help provide for their future after their children have been placed with adoptive families; and

WHEREAS, explicit authority for the program is necessary with the caveat that the program must be kept separate from any program for the placement of children and must be paid for by the agency with separate funds."

DECISIONS PRIOR TO 1997 GENERAL REVISION

Jurisdiction After Child Placed for Adoption Out of State: Once a parent voluntarily signed and executed a form relinquishing parental rights to an adoption agency, the adoption agency became the "sending agency" as defined in 41-4-101, Art. II, with the power to place the child for adoption out of state. The only standing the parent then had in Montana courts was to seek a revocation of the relinquishment with the adoption agency as copetitioner. Under 40-6-135(7) (now repealed), the relinquishment became irrevocable once the child was placed for adoption out of state, and Montana lost jurisdiction. In re Male Child Born July 15, 1985, to L.C., 221 M 309, 718 P2d 660, 43 St. Rep. 835 (1986).

Violation of Interstate Compact on Placement of Children — Illegal Placement as a Result — Revocation of Parent's Consent: Failure of prospective adoptive parents to notify the appropriate public authorities in writing before bringing their prospective adoptive child into Montana violated the Interstate Compact on Placement of Children. The prospective adoptive parents' status as custodians did not prevent the operation of the Compact. By virtue of the failure of the prospective adoptive parents to comply with the Compact, the placement of the child with the prospective adoptive parents in Montana constituted illegal placement under the provisions of the Compact, and the failure to comply constitutes full and sufficient grounds for the revocation of the previously executed "parent's consent". In re the Adoption of T.M.M., 186 M 460, 608 P2d 130 (1980).

Revocation of Consent by Court — Exception: Although a Missouri court having custody of children revoked its original consent on the ground it did not have jurisdiction due to a lack of proper notice to natural parents, 40-8-112 (now repealed) made that consent irrevocable. The only exception to 40-8-112 (now repealed) is upon a finding by the court that the best interests of the child would be served by allowing revocation of consent. In re Adoption of Conley v. Walden, 171 M 58, 555 P2d 960 (1976).

Strict Compliance Required for Effective Revocation of Consent: Mother, after executing affidavit of waiver and consent to adoption, could not effectively revoke that consent by letter addressed to County Department of Public Welfare without following the procedure prescribed by 40-8-112 (now repealed). Application of Hendrickson, 159 M 217, 496 P2d 1115 (1972).

Official Comments

1994 Commissioners' Comment: This section specifies the general legal consequences of a consent or relinquishment and is consistent with the Act's intention to keep track of a minor and assign responsibility for the minor's care and support throughout the adoption process. If executed in substantial compliance with this Part, either document is final and irrevocable except under limited circumstances and entitles the prospective adoptive parents in a direct placement and the agency in an agency placement to the custody of the minor and requires them to provide support and care for the minor. The section also specifies the extent to which further notice of the adoption proceeding is or is not waived by a consent or relinquishment.

Termination of Parental Rights When Relinquishment Form Executed: A parent argued that under the definition of "placement for adoption" in 40-8-103 (now repealed), placement was improper since the adoption agency had not secured a termination order from District Court prior to placing the child out of state. The Supreme Court disagreed, noting that the definition did not require a judicial termination order but only that parental rights had been terminated. The court held that parental rights were terminated when the relinquishment form was executed. In re Male Child Born July 15, 1985, to L.C., 221 M 309, 718 P2d 660, 43 St. Rep. 835 (1986).

Jurisdiction Based on Presence of Child in Montana: In a case in which the natural parents were residents of Wyoming but the child was born in Montana and present in Montana, the District Court had jurisdiction in an action to terminate parental rights under the abuse and neglect statutes, based on the presence of the child in Montana. In re Parental Rights of Baby Girl W., 249 M 206, 814 P2d 976, 48 St. Rep. 643 (1991).

Procedures to Be Rigorously Followed: While there is some overlap in the various statutory schemes governing the termination of parental rights and the custody of children as to general subject matter, each is used for a distinct purpose and sets forth specific procedures which must be rigorously followed before a valid judgment or order may be issued, to insure that the minors involved receive the full protection of these laws. 42-2-603. Petition for termination of parental rights.

Case Notes

Stepparent's Petition to Terminate Biological Parent's Parental Rights Granted Given Evidence of Abandonment: A custodial stepparent has standing to petition for termination of a noncustodial parent's parental rights. In this case, the custodial stepmother petitioned for and was granted termination of the noncustodial mother's rights in order to allow for adoption of the child by the stepmother. The mother appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. The District Court concluded that the mother abandoned the child and thus was an unfit parent. As evidence of abandonment, the court did not err in considering: (1) the mother's time in prison and residential drug treatment, during which she had no contact with the child; (2) during the mother's periods of absence, the mother's struggle with an abusive relationship, use of illegal drugs, and associations with known criminals; (3) the mother's failure to follow through on commitments to care for and visit the child; and (4) a lack of intent on the mother's part to resume care of the child in the future, regardless of any understanding that an initial parenting plan was temporary. Evidence of abandonment was substantial, and the District Court did not err in granting the petition to terminate the mother's parental rights. In re Adoption of K.P.M., 2009 MT 31, 349 M 170, 201 P3d 833 (2009).

Mistake of Law — Aunt and Uncle Lack Standing to Petition for Termination of Parental Rights: In a case involving termination of parental rights, the Supreme Court assumed supervisory control to determine whether G.R. and P.R., the child's aunt and uncle, had standing to bring the amended petition to terminate parental rights and for adoption. A child's aunt and uncle are not parties authorized by 42-1-107 to place a child for adoption. A child may not be placed for adoption until the parental rights of the birth parents have been terminated by a court as provided in Title 41, chapter 3, or Title 42. G.R. and P.R. did not have standing to file a petition for termination of parental rights under 42-2-603(2). Under Title 41, chapter 3, a petition for the termination of parental right based upon abuse or neglect of a child may only be brought by the County Attorney, the Attorney General, or an attorney hired by the county. Section 40-6-233 refers to the abuse of parental authority for making decisions regarding the support and education of a child and is not the basis for terminating parental rights. Therefore, G.R. and P.R. do not have standing to petition for the termination of parental rights based upon abuse or neglect. J.C. v. Eleventh Judicial District Court, 2008 MT 358, 346 M 357, 197 P3d 907 (2008).

Case Notes

DECISIONS AFTER 1997 GENERAL REVISION

No Authority to Terminate Parental Rights of Putative Father When Substantial Parent-Child Relationship Established: Maternal grandparents petitioned to terminate the parental rights of the father of R.A.J., for whom they were guardians. The petition was denied, and on appeal the Supreme Court affirmed. A District Court has authority to terminate a putative father's parental rights upon a determination under 42-2-610 that a putative father failed to establish and maintain a substantial relationship with the child or upon a determination under 42-2-608 that the putative father is unfit. Here, the grandparents made no assertion of unfitness, so the question involved only the issue of substantial relationship. When a petition prays for termination of the parental rights of a putative father, the burden is on the putative father to show that he has established a substantial relationship with the child. In this case, the father met that burden. Although the father had been stationed overseas in the military shortly after the child was born, he provided a fair and reasonable amount of support for the child, considering that the grandparents had obtained guardianship of the child without the father's knowledge and had refused to accept contributions for the child's support. The father had at least monthly contact with the child when he was not overseas, and he manifested an ability and willingness to assume legal and physical custody of the child through continuing and frequent contact, by caring for the child in his home to the extent allowed by the grandparents, and through the pursuit of paternity testing to establish his biological relationship with the child. Having determined that a substantial father-child relationship existed, the District Court correctly concluded as a matter of law that the father's parental rights could not be terminated under 42-2-607(4) or 42-2-610. In re Adoption of R.A.J., 2009 MT 22, 349 M 100, 201 P3d 787 (2009).

Adoption of Children of Parent Whose Parental Rights Terminated Affirmed: The District Court terminated a father's parental rights for nonsupport and granted the stepfather's petition to adopt the children without the father's written permission. The father appealed. Although a child generally may not be adopted without the written consent of both birth parents, written consent is not required of a parent whose parental rights have been terminated, so the Supreme Court addressed whether the termination of parental rights was proper. In this case, the father was able to provide support for his children during an aggregate 1-year period prior to the filing of the adoption petition but failed to do so, rendering him an unfit parent pursuant to 42-2-608. Thus, the District Court did not err in terminating the father's parental rights. In re Adoption of C.W.D. & C.D.D. v. P.K.D., 2005 MT 145, 327 M 301, 114 P3d 214 (2005).

Proper Termination of Parental Rights Based on Conviction for Sexual Assault of Child and Sexual Intercourse Without Consent With Child: Snyder pleaded guilty to sexual assault on a child and sexual intercourse without consent with a child based on his involvement with three young girls. His marriage was dissolved 6 months later and custody was awarded to his former wife, who remarried and then petitioned for termination of Snyder's parental rights so that their son could be adopted by her new husband. The petition was granted, and Snyder appealed. The plain language of 42-2-608 provides that the court may terminate a parent's rights and make the child available for adoption if a parent is convicted of sexual assault on a child or sexual intercourse without consent with a child. There is no statutory requirement that the sexual assault on a child or sexual intercourse without consent with a child has been committed on the adoptee. The trial court did not err when it held that clear and convincing evidence supported the termination of the father's parental rights based on his prior convictions. Case Notes

No Evidence of Willful Parental Abandonment — Termination of Parental Rights Not Warranted: After only sporadic contact between a father and his child over a period of several years and failure of the father to fully comply with child support obligations, the mother petitioned to terminate the father's parental rights on grounds that the father had abandoned the child. The District Court denied the petition and the mother appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Termination of parental rights based on abandonment of a child is not appropriate unless there is clear and convincing evidence that the child was willfully abandoned. In this case, the totality of the circumstances showed that the father's conduct was more in the character of immature, ignorant, uncertain, and lacking in diligent attention to his parenting responsibilities rather than a willful manifestation of intent to abandon the child. The mere fact that the father may have violated a court order within the meaning of 42-2-608 by failing to meet child support obligations in full did not mean that, as a matter of law, his parental rights must be terminated. Thus, although the father was not a model parent, the mother failed to meet the burden of demonstrating by clear and convincing evidence that the father was unfit. Therefore, the District Court properly applied its discretion in denying the petition. In re Stepparent Adoption of B.W.Z.-S., 2009 MT 433, 354 M 116, 222 P3d 613 (2009).

Adoption of Children of Parent Whose Parental Rights Terminated Affirmed: The District Court terminated a father's parental rights for nonsupport and granted the stepfather's petition to adopt the children without the father's written permission. The father appealed. Although a child generally may not be adopted without the written consent of both birth parents, written consent is not required of a parent whose parental rights have been terminated, so the Supreme Court addressed whether the termination of parental rights was proper. In this case, the father was able to provide support for his children during an aggregate 1-year period prior to the filing of the adoption petition but failed to do so, rendering him an unfit parent pursuant to this section. Thus, the District Court did not err in terminating the father's parental rights. In re Adoption of C.W.D. & C.D.D. v. P.K.D., 2005 MT 145, 327 M 301, 114 P3d 214 (2005).

Two-Year Wait to Assert Parental Rights — Failure to Advise Parent of Right to Counsel Harmless Error: A father who was incarcerated waited more than 2 years to file for relief following termination of his parental rights, asserting that he was denied due process by not being provided notice of the right to counsel. The Supreme Court agreed that fairness requires that a parent be represented by counsel at parental termination proceedings, but in this case, the error was harmless because the lack of notice was not prejudicial to the father. There was adequate evidence to terminate the father's parental rights, and even if he had been notified and represented by counsel, there was no way that an attorney would have made a difference under the circumstances and the result would have been the same. Denial of the motion for relief was affirmed. In re P.D.L., 2004 MT 346, 324 M 327, 102 P3d 1225 (2004).

Proper Termination of Parental Rights Based on Conviction for Sexual Assault of Child and Sexual Intercourse Without Consent With Child: Snyder pleaded guilty to sexual assault on a child and sexual intercourse without consent with a child based on his involvement with three young girls. His marriage was dissolved 6 months later and custody was awarded to his former wife, who remarried and then petitioned for termination of Snyder's parental rights so that their son could be adopted by her new husband. The petition was granted, and Snyder appealed. The plain language of this section provides that the court may terminate a parent's rights and make the child available for adoption if a parent is convicted of sexual assault on a child or sexual intercourse without consent with a child. There is no statutory requirement that the sexual assault on a child or sexual intercourse without consent with a child has been committed on the adoptee. The trial court did not err when it held that clear and convincing evidence supported the termination of the father's parental rights based on his prior convictions. In re Adoption of Snyder, 2000 MT 61, 299 M 40, 996 P2d 875, 57 St. Rep. 288 (2000), following In re J.N. & A.N., 1999 MT 64, 293 M 524, 977 P2d 317, 56 St. Rep. 269 (1999).

Factors in Whether Nonconsenting Parent Able to Contribute to Support of Child: In determining whether a parent who does not consent to adoption of a child is able to contribute to support of the child, the District Court shall consider the following factors: (1) the parent's ability to earn income; (2) the parent's willingness to earn an income and support the child; (3) the availability of employment; and (4) the parent's use of funds to provide that parent with only the bare necessities before contributing to child support. DECISIONS PRIOR TO 1997 GENERAL REVISION

Termination of Parental Rights and Adoption Not to Be Accomplished in Same Action: The District Court entered an order terminating the mother's parental rights and allowing the adoption of her children without her consent based upon the fact that her rights had been terminated. The Supreme Court reversed on the basis that the statute allowing for adoption without a parent's consent contemplated that the parent's rights had been terminated by a separate action at some point in the past. In re Adoption of Jane, John, & Mary Doe, 277 M 251, 921 P2d 875, 53 St. Rep. 631 (1996).

Absence of Department Adoption Placement and Written Consent by Department Head — Adoption Order Improper: Under 40-8-108 (now repealed), a court is not included in the list of entities that may place a child for adoption. Therefore, it was improper for a District Court to order a child's placement in the absence of a placement for adoption by the appropriate state agency and the written consent to adoption executed by the executive head of the Department. In re F.H., 272 M 342, 901 P2d 96, 52 St. Rep. 791 (1995). See also In re Adoption of Hall, 173 M 142, 566 P2d 401 (1977).

Inability to Contribute Financial Support to Child Not Abandonment — No Prior Judicial Termination of Parental Rights — Third-Party Petition to Adopt Properly Dismissed: Parents of S.P.M. were divorced and granted joint custody of the child. After a period of time, the father took sole custody after a Department of Family Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) worker filed a report concluding that the mother's new partner was abusing the child. The original joint custody decree was not modified. The father and child moved out of state for 4 years. On their return, the mother petitioned for custody and visitation. In response, the father's new wife petitioned to adopt the child. The District Court dismissed the wife's petition on the grounds that the mother's consent to adoption was required and that the mother had not abandoned the child. The 6-month requirement for abandonment in 41-3-102 applies only to the willful surrender of custody, and even though the mother had not supported the child for 4 years, this did not constitute abandonment when the mother was not capable of providing financial support. Determination of neglect necessitates a proceeding separate from a consent for adoption hearing. Issues in controversy over termination of parental rights are different from inquiry before an adoption court, and the two inquiries should not be mixed. Adoption of S.P.M., 266 M 269, 880 P2d 297, 51 St. Rep. 808 (1994).

Elements of Parent-Child Relationship in Evaluation of Best Interest of Child: A natural parent's rights cannot be terminated under 40-8-111 (now repealed) independent of the determination that adoption is appropriate. Adoption is not appropriate unless it is found to be in the child's best interest. In evaluating the child's best interest, the court should consider benefits of the child's relationship with the natural parent in addition to the benefits derived from financial support. In re Adoption of V.R.O. & V.N.O., 250 M 517, 822 P2d 83, 48 St. Rep. 946 (1991).

Findings Insufficient on Ability to Pay Support — Remand: The order granting a partial summary judgment terminating parental rights based on lack of support during the year prior to filing of the petition listed the following facts in support of the determination that the parent was able to provide support: (1) the parent owned certain assets, including real property, musical equipment, two vehicles, rifles, chain saws, and a truck topper; (2) the parent received a $24,000 lump-sum workers' compensation settlement during the time in question; and (3) the parent did not come into court to attempt to modify the payments but simply chose not to pay support. However, it was not clear whether the assets were convertible to cash that could be used to pay support or whether any of the workers' compensation settlement remained available for this use. Further, the findings did not include discussion on the parent's income or ability to earn income during the relevant period or on the cost of providing himself with the necessities of life and were therefore insufficient as to the issue of the ability to pay child support, warranting remand. De Minimis Support Payments During Year Prior to Petition for Adoption — Parental Rights Terminated: Father maintained his consent was required for adoption of his children by their stepfather because father paid $180 in support during the year preceding stepfather's petition for adoption. Father was obligated to pay $375 a month and to maintain insurance on the children during that year. The Supreme Court noted that any payment of support must first be applied to satisfy the earliest arrearage before it is applied to the support owed during the year before the filing of the petition and that payments made after the filing of the petition may not be applied to the preadoption year. Considering that father's payments were de minimis at best and that he had not maintained insurance, termination of his parental rights was proper. A challenge of the constitutionality of the termination of parental rights based on nonsupport, as authorized by 40-8-111 (now repealed), was dismissed on procedural grounds. In re Adoption of C.J.H., W.L.H., & T.A.H., 246 M 52, 803 P2d 214, 47 St. Rep. 2258 (1990).

Lack of Court Order Requiring Support — Mere Inquiry Insufficient to Toll Statute: The absence of a child support order does not absolve a parent of the legal duty to support a child, nor is mere inquiry regarding child support sufficient to toll the statutory support requirement of 40-8-111 (now repealed). In re Adoption of D.J.V., 244 M 209, 796 P2d 1076, 47 St. Rep. 1522 (1990), followed in In re Adoption of J.M.H. & S.B.H., 264 M 381, 871 P2d 1326, 51 St. Rep. 290 (1994), and In re Adoption of C.R.N., 1999 MT 92, 294 M 202, 979 P2d 210, 56 St. Rep. 388 (1999).

Caring for One of Three Children Constituting Nonsupport: The lower court terminated the natural father's parental rights without his consent on the basis that he had not paid support for more than 1 year. The Supreme Court affirmed the termination, holding that the fact that the father had cared for one of his three children did not constitute compliance with the dissolution order. In re Adoption of R.M., 241 M 111, 785 P2d 709, 47 St. Rep. 124 (1990).

Service on Party's Attorney Sufficient Notice: The trial court terminated the natural father's parental rights without his consent on the basis that he had not paid child support for a period of 1 year. The father argued that he had left the state prior to the finalization of the decree and never learned of his support obligation. The Supreme Court affirmed the termination and ruled that service on the father's attorney was sufficient notice, even though the attorney did not know of the father's whereabouts. In re Adoption of R.M., 241 M 111, 785 P2d 709, 47 St. Rep. 124 (1990), followed in In re Adoption of J.M.H. & S.B.H., 264 M 381, 871 P2d 1326, 51 St. Rep. 290 (1994), holding that natural father, who was notified of the hearing, waived due process claims by failing to attend or send a representative to the "best interest" hearing.

Court Need Find Only One Substitute for Consent to Proceed With Adoption: The Supreme Court held that the lower court had to find only one of the statutorily enumerated substitutes for consent in order to proceed with an adoption. There was clear evidence of abandonment, therefore the court did not have to consider the sufficiency of the evidence concerning nonsupport or the validity of the guardians' consent to the adoption. Adoption of C.R.D., 240 M 106, 782 P2d 1280, 46 St. Rep. 1979 (1989), followed in In re L.E.B., 259 M 492, 856 P2d 1382, 50 St. Rep. 895 (1993).

Natural Father's Consent to Adoption Not Required When Evidence Clear He Abandoned Child: The father had only visited with his daughter twice and called her on the telephone twice in 8 years and during that time never paid support. The Supreme Court affirmed the lower court's finding that the record contained clear and convincing evidence that the natural father had willfully abandoned his daughter, and therefore his consent to the child's adoption by her grandparents was not required. Adoption of C.R.D., 240 M 106, 782 P2d 1280, 46 St. Rep. 1979 (1989).

Question of Abandonment Not Within Subject Matter Jurisdiction Regarding Modification: Husband was served a petition for adoption of his children by wife's new husband. The petition alleged abandonment. The District Court improperly considered the question of abandonment during the postdissolution hearing, which centered around the issues of visitation and unpaid child support. The question was outside the scope of issues included within the original dissolution decree, was to be decided by the court hearing the adoption proceedings, and should have been dismissed under former Rule 12(h)(3), M.R.Civ.P. (now superseded). In re Marriage of Callahan, 233 M 465, 762 P2d 205, 45 St. Rep. 1639 (1988).

Purview of Court to Evaluate Conflicting Testimony — Equitable Estoppel Not Bar to Claim of Failure to Pay Support: Father claimed he had not made support payments because mother told him she wanted to make it on her own, that she was not worried about payments while he was unemployed, that she had refused his offer of money from the sale of property, and that for these reasons she was estopped from consenting to termination of his parental rights. Mother testified she told father that support payments must be made through the Clerk of Court and that she expected payments while he was working. It was entirely within the court's purview to rely on mother's testimony, and the claim of failure to support was not barred by equitable estoppel. In re Adoption of S.E., 232 M 31, 755 P2d 27, 45 St. Rep. 843 (1988).

Standard of Proof — Clear and Convincing Evidence: The natural father erroneously characterized the determination of whether his parental rights should be terminated as a "best interest of the child" question. The "best interest" test is applied after parental rights have been terminated to determine whether the adoption should be allowed. Rather, the standard of proof under 40-8-111 (now repealed) is clear and convincing evidence. In re Adoption of S.E., 232 M 31, 755 P2d 27, 45 St. Rep. 843 (1988), followed in In re Adoption of J.B.T. & W.D.T., 250 M 205, 819 P2d 178, 48 St. Rep. 793 (1991).

Termination of Parental Rights of Joint Custody: Father argued that parental rights of a parent with joint custody could not be terminated under 40-8-111 (now repealed); however, the provisions allowing termination upon failure to support are not limited to a particular type of custodial status. Any parent who is able but does not support a child for 1 year forfeits the right to withhold consent to adoption. In re Adoption of S.E., 232 M 31, 755 P2d 27, 45 St. Rep. 843 (1988).

Adoption Proceeding Not to Be Thwarted by Refusal of Natural Parent to Consent: A putative father argued that 40-8-111 (now repealed) did not apply because it required that a petition for adoption be filed and no petition had been filed at the time he was asked for his consent. He never paid any support for the child, but contended that a formal petition would have put him on notice of the proceeding, thus allowing him to make support payments. The Supreme Court found that this argument was circuitous and that to accept it would allow any natural parent to thwart a legitimate adoption proceeding merely by refusing consent so that no valid petition for adoption could be filed. In re Adoption of R.G.C., 228 M 345, 742 P2d 471, 44 St. Rep. 1586 (1987).

Best Interest Test Properly Applied: A putative father contended that 40-6-130 (now repealed) required a finding as to his fitness as a parent before a determination could be made as to what was best for the child. While proof of abuse or neglect is required to terminate a parent's rights in a proceeding involving a youth in need of care, in adoption proceedings the standard to be applied, as outlined in 40-6-130 (now repealed), is the best interest of the child. In re Adoption of R.G.C., 228 M 345, 742 P2d 471, 44 St. Rep. 1586 (1987).

Measurement of Support Period: In adoption proceedings under 40-8-109 (now repealed), the provisions of 40-8-111 (now repealed) relating to the 1-year period of support should be measured against the commencement of the adoption proceedings rather than against the date of the petition for adoption. In re Adoption of R.G.C., 228 M 345, 742 P2d 471, 44 St. Rep. 1586 (1987).

Adoption Without Consent When No Child Support Paid — Ability to Work: Natural father contended he did not pay child support for over 1 year due to physical and psychological problems. The Supreme Court affirmed adoption without consent upon finding the natural father was able to maintain employment but did not by choice, voluntarily chose a lifestyle to avoid gainful employment while allowing others to support him, and failed to apply some proceeds of a workers' compensation settlement toward his child support obligations. Further, the District Court did not err in allowing evidence concerning events outside of the 1-year period because the events were relevant to the natural father's mental and physical condition during the subject year. In re Adoption of J.M.G., J.J.G., & C.C.G., 226 M 525, 736 P2d 967, 44 St. Rep. 869 (1987).

Best Interests of Child: If the statutory requirements for consent to adoption are met, the best interests of the child become the paramount consideration. Providing Articles of Clothing or In-Kind Payments — Support Obligation Not Satisfied: A parent's obligation to contribute to the financial support of a child is not satisfied by provision of articles of clothing or other in-kind payments. Support Other Than as Required by Decree — When Valid: The father was obligated by the decree to pay $125 child support a month for each of two children. The parents later orally agreed that each would totally support one child. The father's conduct of totally supporting one child under the agreement was held to be the equivalent of providing financial support for both children, and therefore his consent was required for adoption of the other child. In re Adoption of E.S.R., 218 M 118, 706 P2d 132, 42 St. Rep. 1448 (1985).

Support During One-Year Period Before Filing Petition: W.A.S. paid child support from the time of his divorce until June 1981, which was shortly after his former spouse remarried. No support payment was made in July 1981, but a payment made in August 1981 was applied to July. No other payment was made until December 1981, when a $450 payment was made. On December 2, 1982, a petition was filed seeking the adoption of R.A.S. by his stepfather. The court determined that the December 1981 payment applied to August, September, and October 1981 and that W.A.S. did not contribute to the support of his child during a period of 1 year before the filing of the petition for adoption. Since no contribution was made, the consent of W.A.S. was not required. Finding of Abuse, Neglect, or Dependency Necessary Before Consideration of Best Interests of the Child: M.G.M. was born out of wedlock and had little contact with her natural father until the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) placed M.G.M. in a foster home and terminated her mother's parental rights. The Department then sought to terminate the father's parental rights. To terminate his parental rights, the court must first find that the child is abused, neglected, or dependent. Only when such a finding has been made can the court apply the best interests of the child test. In re M.G.M., 201 M 400, 654 P2d 994, 39 St. Rep. 2191 (1982), followed in In re J.B., 278 M 160, 923 P2d 1096, 53 St. Rep. 901 (1996).

Determination of Neglect at Custody Hearing Not Sufficient: After the death of the custodial mother, the maternal grandmother took the children into her home. The natural father petitioned to have the children restored to his custody. The grandmother requested custody and filed a petition for adoption. In a proceeding pursuant to 40-4-221, the grandmother was granted custody because the father had failed to make child support payments for more than a year and had generally neglected the children. The trial court properly dismissed the grandmother's petition for adoption for lack of jurisdiction. The determination of neglect needed to excuse the need for the father's consent to adoption under 40-8-111 (now repealed) must be made in a separate proceeding pursuant to Title 41, ch. 3, part 6. Brost v. Glasgow, 200 M 194, 651 P2d 32, 39 St. Rep. 1679 (1982).

Termination of Parent's Parental Rights for Failure to Support Child: Mother filed petition for termination of father's parental rights and replacement of him as the children's father with her second husband. Father had for the 2 years prior to the petition failed to make court-ordered child support payments, although financially able to do so. Father made two lump-sum payments after filing of the petition but was still several thousand dollars in arrears. Mother's testimony indicated she had received only $670 from father, who was supposed to make the support payments to the court. Father's testimony indicated, at best, that he contributed $2,725 to the children's support during the 2-year period, several thousand dollars less than that due. The District Court erroneously failed to terminate father's parental rights, which were terminated by Supreme Court on appeal by mother. In re Marriage of Burns, 198 M 365, 646 P2d 530, 39 St. Rep. 1059 (1982).

"If Able to Support" — Voluntary Change in Lifestyle: The nonsupporting parent was mentally and physically capable of obtaining full-time employment but refused to do so. His voluntary choice of a lifestyle was inconsistent with his responsibility to contribute to the child's support, and for the purposes of 40-8-111 (now repealed), he was able to support the child. A parent should not be able to enjoy the benefits of parental rights while voluntarily shunning the burden of parental obligation. In re the Adoption of S.L.R., 196 M 411, 640 P2d 886, 39 St. Rep. 156 (1982), followed in In re Adoption of B.L.P., 224 M 182, 728 P2d 803, 43 St. Rep. 2116 (1986), In re Adoption of K.L.J.K., 224 M 418, 730 P2d 1135, 43 St. Rep. 2297 (1986), and in In re Adoption of J.M.H. & S.B.H., 264 M 381, 871 P2d 1326, 51 St. Rep. 290 (1994). See also In re Adoption of J.B.T. & W.D.T., 250 M 205, 819 P2d 178, 48 St. Rep. 793 (1991).

Proof of Nonsupport, Abandonment, Cruelty, and Neglect Insufficient to Excuse Consent of Natural Father: Where the stepfather of two children petitioned the court to adopt those children and the children's natural father filed an objection to the petition, the District Court did not err in its refusal to excuse the requirement that consent of the natural father be obtained. The evidence submitted by the stepfather to prove nonsupport, abandonment, cruelty, and neglect of the children failed to meet the burden of proof required by 40-8-111 (now repealed), and the District Court therefore properly dismissed the petition for adoption for lack of parental consent. Other grounds for excusing consent and allegations of error were not reviewed by the Supreme Court, as they were raised for the first time on appeal. In re the Adoption of T.G.K. & J.P.K., 193 M 139, 630 P2d 740, 38 St. Rep. 1030 (1981).

Absence of Abuse or Neglect: Judgment was reversed and custody of two children taken from their maternal aunt and returned to the natural father since there was no showing that the children were abused or neglected. The District Court improperly deprived the father of custody by means of the subterfuge of a guardianship that had outlived the purpose for which it was created. In re Guardianship of Doney, 174 M 282, 570 P2d 575 (1977).

Invalid Adoption Decree: An adoption decree was invalid for lack of notice to the natural parents and the absence of consent by abandonment since only 24 days elapsed from birth to filing of the adoption petition. That being so, laches and estoppel could not save the nonexistent decree but the best interests of the child justified a permanent custody award to the defendants. In re Adoption of Hall, 173 M 142, 566 P2d 401 (1977).

Burden of Proving That Consent Not Required: When petitioner relies upon the statutory exception to consent based on failure to support, he bears the burden of proving that the parent was able to give support in addition to showing failure to contribute; the court will not waive the consent requirement if the petitioner is attempting to argue abandonment because such allegation was not contained in the petition. In re Adoption of Challeen, 172 M 362, 563 P2d 1120 (1977).

Support as Financial Support: Section 40-8-111 (now repealed) clearly means financial support where it refers to "support". In re Adoption of Smigaj, 171 M 531, 560 P2d 141 (1977), followed by In re the Adoption of S.L.R., 196 M 411, 640 P2d 886, 39 St. Rep. 156 (1982).

Collateral Attack on Adoption Decree — Res Judicata: The res judicata doctrine bars an action to void an adoption decree when the issue of the best interests of the children and the validity of the decree were litigated in a prior habeas corpus action. In re Adoption of Conley v. Walden, 171 M 58, 555 P2d 960 (1976).

In Habeas Corpus Proceeding Welfare of Child as Paramount Factor: Habeas corpus proceeding seeking custody of children is an equitable proceeding, and whether the action is treated as habeas corpus or a petition to set aside an adoption, the welfare of the child is the paramount factor. Application of Conley v. Walden, 166 M 369, 533 P2d 955 (1975).

Reliance Upon Judicial Ruling of Other States: In granting petition for adoption without consent of parents, Montana court was entitled to rely on ruling of Missouri court depriving parents of custody, and even though parents, 5 years later, persuaded the Missouri court to set aside its ruling, the Montana adoption was made in the best interest of the children and would not be set aside. Application of Conley v. Walden, 166 M 369, 533 P2d 955 (1975).

Mother to Consent Lacking Evidence of Her Ability and Failure to Support: Minor child supported during preceding 4 years by its father and aunt and uncle did not warrant order authorizing adoption of child by aunt and uncle after father's death where mother did not give consent and there was no evidence mother was able and failed to give support during that period. In re Adoption of Biery, 164 M 353, 522 P2d 1377 (1974).

Noncompliance With Procedure: Mother, after executing affidavit of waiver and consent to adoption, could not effectively revoke that consent by letter addressed to County Department of Public Welfare without following the procedure prescribed by 40-8-111 (now repealed). Application of Hendrickson, 159 M 217, 496 P2d 1115 (1972).

Estoppel: Where mother of child born out of wedlock joined in and agreed to petition allowing natural father and his wife to adopt child, mother was estopped from attacking the resulting decree of adoption 2 years later. In re Adoption of Curtis, 143 M 330, 390 P2d 209 (1964).

Case Notes

No Authority to Terminate Parental Rights of Putative Father When Substantial Parent-Child Relationship Established: Maternal grandparents petitioned to terminate the parental rights of the father of R.A.J., for whom they were guardians. The petition was denied, and on appeal the Supreme Court affirmed. A District Court has authority to terminate a putative father's parental rights upon a determination under 42-2-610 that a putative father failed to establish and maintain a substantial relationship with the child or upon a determination under 42-2-608 that the putative father is unfit. Here, the grandparents made no assertion of unfitness, so the question involved only the issue of substantial relationship. When a petition prays for termination of the parental rights of a putative father, the burden is on the putative father to show that he has established a substantial relationship with the child. In this case, the father met that burden. Although the father had been stationed overseas in the military shortly after the child was born, he provided a fair and reasonable amount of support for the child, considering that the grandparents had obtained guardianship of the child without the father's knowledge and had refused to accept contributions for the child's support. The father had at least monthly contact with the child when he was not overseas, and he manifested an ability and willingness to assume legal and physical custody of the child through continuing and frequent contact, by caring for the child in his home to the extent allowed by the grandparents, and through the pursuit of paternity testing to establish his biological relationship with the child. Having determined that a substantial father-child relationship existed, the District Court correctly concluded as a matter of law that the father's parental rights could not be terminated under 42-2-607(4) or 42-2-610. Case Notes

Time Limit for Appeal of Termination of Parental Rights Running From Service of Notice of Entry of Judgment — Laches Inapplicable: The District Court determined that a mother abandoned her children and terminated the mother's parental rights; however, the mother was never served with notice of entry of judgment regarding the termination. The mother moved to vacate or void the order and requested a hearing on the termination, but the motion was denied. The state contended that further consideration of the issue was barred by this section or by laches. The Supreme Court disagreed that the mother's appeal was barred by this section because the statute does not alter the filing period for timely appeals but merely sets a 6-month time limit on all other challenges to orders terminating parental rights. Rather, former Rule 77(d), M.R.Civ.P. (now superseded), applied. The rule requires service of notice of entry of judgment, and former Rule 5, M.R.App.P. (now superseded), provided that the 60-day time limit for appeals did not apply until service of notice of entry of judgment, but the mother was never served. The equitable doctrine of laches also did not apply because the state failed to discharge its simple affirmative duty to notify the mother of entry of judgment. Thus, the mother's appeal was timely. Motion for Relief From Termination of Parental Rights Filed Two Years After Termination Untimely as Matter of Law: Both parents were charged in Idaho with sexual abuse crimes against their children, but the parents eluded authorities for several years. P.D.L. was born while the parents were fugitives. Both parents were eventually captured and convicted, and the father was incarcerated for a 17-year term in Idaho. Following service of a petition in prison, the father's parental rights were terminated. More than 2 years later, the father filed a motion for relief from the termination order under former Rule 60(b), M.R.Civ.P. (now superseded), but the motion was denied. On appeal, the Supreme Court noted the finality provision in this section, which attempts to provide finality to parental rights termination proceedings so that a child may be safely adopted without the threat of the adoption being set aside at some future date. The termination order was immune from collateral attack 6 months after it was entered, and the father's motion for relief filed more than 2 years later was untimely as a matter of law. Criteria for Intervention in Adoption Proceeding — Unfounded and Untimely Motion to Intervene Properly Denied: Couple A adopted a child through a judicial decree in the District Court of the Twenty-First Judicial District. Couple B also wanted to adopt the child and filed a motion, in the District Court of the Twelfth Judicial District where they lived, to intervene and set aside the final decree of adoption, despite the fact that some 6 months had passed since the final adoption decree was issued. Initially, neither District Court was aware of the competing adoption petitions. The Department of Public Health and Human Services had been reviewing both couples as potential adoptive resources at the same time and ultimately determined that because the child had formed a strong bond during placement with couple A for nearly 2 years, it would be in the child's best interests to be adopted by couple A. Couple B contended that the child was a member of their extended family and that the Department should have given them priority as adoptive parents. The Twenty-First District Court held that couple B had no standing to intervene as a matter of right pursuant to former Rule 24(a), M.R.Civ.P. (now superseded), and that permissive intervention under former Rule 24(b), M.R.Civ.P. (now superseded), was untimely and would undermine the purpose of adoption to the detriment of the child. Couple B's motion to set aside the final decree pursuant to former Rule 60(b), M.R.Civ.P. (now superseded), was also denied on grounds that as nonparties to couple A's adoption petition, couple B had no standing to make the motion and that, in any case, it was untimely because it was made more than 180 days after the final decree. Couple B appealed the denial of both motions, arguing first that they had a legal interest by virtue of the family placement preference in the Indian Child Welfare Act (ICWA) and legislative and Departmental policies favoring adoptive placement with extended family members. The Supreme Court noted that a mere claim of interest is insufficient to support intervention as a matter of right and that a party seeking intervention must make a prima facie showing of a direct, substantial, legally protectable interest in the proceedings. No such showing was made here because the child was not Indian and therefore not subject to the ICWA, nor did the relationship of second cousins meet the definition of extended family member. Couple B next argued that they should have been allowed to intervene under the permissive standard of former Rule 24(b), M.R.Civ.P., because the competing adoption petitions had common issues of law and fact. Couple B contended that their delay should be excused by their reliance on misrepresentations made by the Department. The Supreme Court agreed that the Department could have taken a more forthright approach and saved all the parties considerable time and expense, but couple B bore the responsibility for ensuring the timely filing of the motion to intervene. The Supreme Court noted that timeliness is a threshold issue when intervention is sought and that, although none of the factors are dispositive, most courts look to four factors in considering whether a motion to intervene is timely filed: (1) the length of time that the intervenor knew or should have known of its interest in the case before moving to intervene; (2) prejudice to the original parties, if intervention is granted, resulting from the intervenor's delay; (3) prejudice to the intervenor if the motion is denied; and (4) any unusual circumstances mitigating for or against a determination that the application is timely. The Supreme Court considered each factor in detail. Although the third factor weighed in favor of couple B, because denial of the motion to intervene effectively precluded any hope of their adoption of the child, the other factors weighed strongly against them. The District Court made a reasoned analysis when it determined that the motion to intervene was untimely and did not abuse its discretion in denying the motion. Last, because couple B did not address the threshold issues of former Rule 60(b), M.R.Civ.P., on appeal, the Supreme Court concluded that denial of the motion to set aside the final adoption decree on grounds of standing and timeliness was proper. CHAPTER 3

REQUIREMENTS OF PARTIES IN ADOPTION

Chapter Compiler's Comments

1997 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 480, L. 1997, provided: "A statement of intent is required for this bill because the bill gives the department of public health and human services authority to adopt administrative rules. The rules must provide procedures for the putative father registry, including methods of notification, filing, and accessing information. The department shall adopt rules for licensing child-placing agencies. To the extent feasible, the rules should incorporate existing procedures. The needs of the child in the adoption proceeding must be the primary focus of the rules."

Severability: Section 172, Ch. 480, L. 1997, was a severability clause.

Applicability: Section 173, Ch. 480, L. 1997 provided: "(1) [Sections 1 through 156] [Title 42, chapters 1 through 7, and Title 52, chapter 8, part 1] apply to proceedings commenced on or after October 1, 1997.

(2) A petition for adoption filed prior to October 1, 1997, is governed by the law in effect at the time the petition was filed.

(3) The putative father registry requirements apply to children born on or after October 1, 1997."

Effective Date: Section 177, Ch. 480, L. 1997, provided: "(1) Except as provided in subsection (2), [this act] is effective October 1, 1997.

(2) [Sections 19 through 26, 28 through 38, 60, 65, 67, 68, and 75] [42-2-202 through 42-2-209, 42-2-214 through 42-2-218, 42-2-222 through 42-2-226, 42-2-230, 42-2-503, 42-2-604, 42-2-605, 42-2-606, and 42-2-611] are effective October 1, 1998."

Part 1
Duty of Placing Party to Disclose Information

42-3-101. Duty to disclose information — form — availability — filing.

DECISIONS AFTER 1997 GENERAL REVISION

Full and Accurate Disclosure of Adoption Information Required: The Jacksons' adoptive son required extensive medical and psychological therapy. The Jacksons sued the state, contending that the state had a legal duty to inform them of the boy's condition and of his parents' medical backgrounds and that failure to do so constituted negligent misrepresentation, negligent nondisclosure, negligence based on lack of informed consent, and negligent supervision. The state contended that the imposition of a common-law or statutory duty to disclose the background information would conflict with its duty to maintain confidentiality of the birth parents' medical records. The District Court dismissed the claims, concluding that the state owed the Jacksons no duty of care upon which the negligence claims could be premised. Citing the opinions of several courts of other states, the Supreme Court held that recognizing a cause of action for negligent misrepresentation in the adoption context would promote public policy and ensure that adoptive parents would assume parenting responsibilities in an informed manner. Anything less than the exercise of due care in the dissemination of information to prospective adoptive parents is unacceptable. Although a slight burden is imposed on the state in providing the information, that burden is justified in light of the compelling need for adoptive parents to receive all available information regarding a child who might soon be a permanent member of the family. Full disclosure of a child's medical and familial background is warranted not only to enable adoptive parents to obtain timely and appropriate medical care for the child but also to enable them to make an intelligent and informed decision to adopt. Summary judgment was reversed. (Note: See this section wherein the 1997 Legislature enacted a statutory requirement that social and medical histories of the birth families must be provided to a prospective adoptive parent.) 1999 Amendment: Chapter 257 at end of (1)(a) deleted "by any person over the age of 13 living in the prospective home"; near middle of (2)(a) after "give the" substituted "evaluator" for "department or agency"; in (2)(b) in first sentence near beginning after "study" substituted "may" for "must" and substituted "any person" for "each person over the age of 13", near middle of second sentence substituted "evaluator" for "agency or department", and at beginning of third sentence inserted "if applicable"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 5, 1999.

42-3-204. Contents of preplacement evaluation.

Official Comments

1994 Commissioners' Comment: Subsection (c) [sic] [(1)] lists the information that must be obtained. In addition to basic biographical data, the information sought focuses on items that may raise specific concerns about the individual's suitability to be an adoptive parent, especially items pertaining to drug or alcohol abuse, involvement in incidents of domestic violence or child abuse or neglect, or failure to support other children. Subsection (d) [sic] [not enacted in Montana] requires the individual to be fingerprinted in order to facilitate a criminal records check and subsection (e) [sic] [not enacted in Montana] requires the individual to furnish signed releases to enable the evaluator to obtain other information.

Changes From 1994 Uniform Act: In (1) after "evaluation" inserted "report" and substituted "if available" for "about the individual being evaluated"; in (1)(g) inserted "or convicted of" and substituted "has been involved in a substantiated charge of child abuse or neglect or elder abuse or neglect" for "a violation of [the State's child protection statute]"; in (1)(j) substituted "child" for "minor"; and made minor changes in style.

42-3-205. Recommendation.

Official Comments

1994 Commissioners' Comment: This section establishes the minimum requirements for a favorable evaluation. It focuses on factors that may warrant a determination that an individual is not suitable to become an adoptive parent — specific concerns that pose significant risks of harm to the physical or psychological well-being of a minor. A finding of unsuitability has to be supported by a written explanation of precisely how each specific concern poses a risk of harm to the minor. For example, an individual should not be disqualified solely because of low income, or because he or she lives in a small house or apartment, unless the individual's financial status or residence is so inadequate for the needs of a child that it poses a threat to the child's well-being

These provisions are not intended to preclude an agency or an independent evaluator from asking additional questions intended to gauge an individual's capacity to adopt different kinds of children. Nor are evaluators or agencies precluded from offering pre-adoption counseling to prospective adoptive parents. This section should be read in conjunction with other provisions of the Act — e.g., Sections 1-102, 2-104, 2-206 [not enacted in Montana] — that are intended to protect individuals who seek to adopt from being unreasonably or categorically excluded from consideration.

Case Notes

DECISIONS AFTER 1997 GENERAL REVISION

Postadoption Visitation Agreement — District Court Responsibilities: The District Court did not err when it modified sua sponte the parties' postadoption visitation agreement to provide weekend visitation and weekly telephone contact with the birth mother because the modification was determined to be in the best interests of the child. The finding was supported by substantial evidence, and the court did not misapprehend the effect of the evidence. Adoptive parents do not have sole discretion in deciding whether a postadoption visitation agreement should be enforced. Rather, the adoptive parents' wishes are but one factor among many to be considered in determining the child's best interests under 40-4-212. Groves v. Clark, 1999 MT 117, 294 M 417, 982 P2d 446, 56 St. Rep. 490 (1999).

Sua Sponte Modification of Postadoption Visitation Agreement Within Discretion of District Court: The rule that in the context of separation agreements made between spouses, parties cannot make binding agreements concerning the support, custody, or visitation of children applies equally to postadoption agreements made between an adopted child's birth parents and adoptive parents. The best interests of the child are paramount, and sua sponte modification of an original visitation agreement in this case was within the discretion of the District Court after determining the best interests of the adopted child. Groves v. Clark, 1999 MT 117, 294 M 417, 982 P2d 446, 56 St. Rep. 490 (1999). DECISIONS PRIOR TO 1997 GENERAL REVISION

Postadoption Visitation Agreement Between Natural Mother and Adoptive Parents — Responsibilities of District Court: Groves consented to the adoption of her child by the Clarks on the condition that the Clarks sign a visitation agreement allowing Groves to have specified contact with her daughter. After the document was signed and the adoption completed, the Clarks tried to terminate Groves' contact with her daughter. Groves brought an action for specific performance of the visitation agreement, but the District Court held that the agreement was void from its inception under 40-8-125 (now repealed). The Supreme Court reversed, holding that In re C.P., 221 M 180, 717 P2d 1093 (1986), was distinguishable and that the Legislature would not have enacted 40-8-136 (now repealed) if 40-8-125 (now repealed) terminated the interests of the natural parent altogether. The Supreme Court also noted that 40-8-136 (now repealed) also places a burden upon the adoptive parents and, in this case, upon the adoption agency that acted as Groves' agent, to make sure that the visitation agreement was filed in accordance with that statute. The Supreme Court also concluded that under 40-8-114 (now repealed), the District Court has a responsibility to make sure that the enforcement is in the best interests of the child. Groves v. Clark, 277 M 179, 920 P2d 981, 53 St. Rep. 703 (1996).

Adoption Petition Not Brought in Bad Faith: The mother of a child petitioned to have her child adopted by her ex-husband. The child's father, also an ex-husband of the mother, had the petition dismissed because he had not voluntarily relinquished his parental rights. The biological father asked for sanctions against the mother and her attorney, arguing that the petition had been brought in bad faith and for an improper purpose. He argued that even a cursory reading of 40-8-109 (now repealed) would have shown that the petition could not be properly filed and that the action had only been undertaken to interfere with his visitation rights. The Supreme Court refused to impose sanctions, holding that to avoid sanctions under former Rule 11, M.R.Civ.P. (now superseded), it is not necessary that a party be correct in his view of the law, only that he make a good faith argument in support of his view. 42-4-302. Standing to adopt stepchild.

Official Comments

1994 Commissioners' Comment: In addition to permitting individuals who are within the formal definition of "stepparent" to adopt a minor stepchild under this Article, Section 4-102 [42-4-302] allows an individual who is a de facto stepparent, but is not, or is no longer, married to the custodial parent, to adopt as if he or she were a de jure stepparent. To file a petition under this Article, the de facto stepparent or "second parent" has to have the consent of the court and the custodial parent, whose parental rights will not be terminated by an adoption under this Article. In addition, for the court to grant the petition, the other requirements of this Article have to be met, including the court's determination that the adoption is in the minor adoptee's best interests. See, e.g., Adoption of B.L.V.B., 628 A.2d 1271 (Vt. 1993) (de facto stepmother allowed to adopt her unmarried partner's biological children because it "serves no legitimate state interest" to deny the children "the security of a legally recognized relationship with their second parent"). See similar analysis in Matter of Evan, 153 Misc.2d 844, 583 N.Y.S.2d 997 (Surr. 1992).

If a stepchild's noncustodial parent refuses to consent to the proposed stepparent adoption or cannot be located, an adoption petition under this Article may be joined with a petition under Article 3, Part 5 [not enacted in Montana], to terminate the parent-child relationship with the noncustodial parent. In most cases, the termination petition will allege that the noncustodial parent has failed to support and visit or communicate with the child for at least six months before the stepparent files the adoption petition, Section 3-504(c)(2) [not enacted in Montana], or that, even if the noncustodial parent had a compelling reason for failing to pay support and visit in the past, he is unlikely to perform these duties in the future, Section 3-504(d)(2) [not enacted in Montana]. Of course, the stepparent and the custodial parent may also seek to prove any of the other grounds stated in Section 3-504 [not enacted in Montana] for terminating the noncustodial parent's rights.

1999 Amendment: Chapter 257 in (1) substituted "child" for "stepchild"; and in (1)(a) near beginning before "legal" deleted "sole". Amendment effective April 5, 1999.

"This Article", referred to in the first paragraph of the Commissioners' comment, is Article 4 of the 1994 Act, composed of 13 separate sections, not all of which have been enacted in Montana.

"Article 3, Part 5", referred to in the second paragraph of the Commissioners' comment, is entitled "Petition to Terminate Relationship Between Parent and Child" and is composed of six sections, none of which have been enacted in Montana. However, sections somewhat similar to those in Article 3, Part 5, of the 1994 Act are found in Title 42, ch. 2, parts 5 and 6.

Case Notes

DECISIONS AFTER 1997 GENERAL REVISION

Stepparent's Petition to Terminate Biological Parent's Parental Rights Granted Given Evidence of Abandonment: A custodial stepparent has standing to petition for termination of a noncustodial parent's parental rights. In this case, the custodial stepmother petitioned for and was granted termination of the noncustodial mother's rights in order to allow for adoption of the child by the stepmother. The mother appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. The District Court concluded that the mother abandoned the child and thus was an unfit parent. As evidence of abandonment, the court did not err in considering: (1) the mother's time in prison and residential drug treatment, during which she had no contact with the child; (2) during the mother's periods of absence, the mother's struggle with an abusive relationship, use of illegal drugs, and associations with known criminals; (3) the mother's failure to follow through on commitments to care for and visit the child; and (4) a lack of intent on the mother's part to resume care of the child in the future, regardless of any understanding that an initial parenting plan was temporary. Evidence of abandonment was substantial, and the District Court did not err in granting the petition to terminate the mother's parental rights. 42-4-304. Consent to adoption — stepparent's spouse.

Official Comments

1994 Commissioners' Comment: The provisions in this and the next two sections pertaining to the consent of the stepchild's custodial parent (i.e., the stepparent's spouse) and the noncustodial parent are similar to the requirements for consent in a direct placement adoption, Article 2, Part 4 [not enacted in Montana], but are specifically tailored to the context of an adoption by a stepparent.

Compiler's Comments

1999 Amendment: Chapter 257 in (2)(a) after "custody of the" deleted "parent's"; and near middle of (2)(c)(iii) substituted "relinquishment" for "consent". Amendment effective April 5, 1999.

Changes From 1994 Uniform Act: In (1) substituted "signed in the presence of an individual authorized to take acknowledgments" for "signed or confirmed in the presence of an individual specified in Section 2-405" (not enacted in Montana); in (2) near beginning after "writing" omitted requirement that statement contain statements required in Section 2-406(a)(1) through

(3) and (d)(3) through (6) of 1994 Uniform Adoption Act and may contain optional statements described in Section 2-406(f) (not enacted in Montana); in (2)(c)(ii) after "approved by the court" omitted "pursuant to Section 4-113" (not enacted in Montana) and at end omitted "the other parent remains liable for arrearages of child support unless released from that obligation by the parent executing the consent and by a government entity providing public assistance to the minor" and omitted final subsection that provided "A consent may not waive further notice of the proceedings for adoption of the minor by the stepparent"; and made minor changes in style.

The "next two sections" referred to in the 1994 Commissioners' comment are Sections 4-106, similar to 42-4-305 (now repealed), and 4-107. Section 4-107, specifying the form for a consent executed by other persons, has not been enacted in Montana.

Compiler's Comments

1999 Amendment: Chapter 257 at beginning substituted "In a stepparent adoption, if the court is" for "If the child is a stepchild or a member of the extended family of the petitioner, the court may, if", near middle after "waive" inserted "the requirement of a preplacement evaluation", and near end substituted "evaluation and report" for "evaluation period and the postplacement evaluation". Amendment effective April 5, 1999.

42-4-310. Petition for adoption — notice — hearing.

Compiler's Comments

1999 Amendment: Chapter 257 near beginning substituted "shall obtain an order of termination of parental rights of the child's noncustodial parent prior to or contemporaneously with the petition to adopt. Any necessary consents must be filed with the" for "must file a" and after "adoption" deleted "any necessary consents, any required postplacement evaluation" and in second sentence inserted "stepparent shall"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 5, 1999.

Case Notes

Stepparent's Petition to Terminate Biological Parent's Parental Rights Granted Given Evidence of Abandonment: A custodial stepparent has standing to petition for termination of a noncustodial parent's parental rights. In this case, the custodial stepmother petitioned for and was granted termination of the noncustodial mother's rights in order to allow for adoption of the child by the stepmother. The mother appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. The District Court concluded that the mother abandoned the child and thus was an unfit parent. As evidence of abandonment, the court did not err in considering: (1) the mother's time in prison and residential drug treatment, during which she had no contact with the child; (2) during the mother's periods of absence, the mother's struggle with an abusive relationship, use of illegal drugs, and associations with known criminals; (3) the mother's failure to follow through on commitments to care for and visit the child; and (4) a lack of intent on the mother's part to resume care of the child in the future, regardless of any understanding that an initial parenting plan was temporary. Evidence of abandonment was substantial, and the District Court did not err in granting the petition to terminate the mother's parental rights. In re Adoption of K.P.M., 2009 MT 31, 349 M 170, 201 P3d 833 (2009).

42-4-311. Legal consequences of adoption of stepchild.

Official Comments

1994 Commissioners' Comment: Although the legal consequences of an adoption of a stepchild are generally the same as under Sections 1-104 through 1-106 [not enacted in Montana], this section provides that the rights and duties of the adoptive parent's spouse — i.e., the child's custodial parent — are not terminated by the adoption. The child remains in all respects the child of the adoptive parent's spouse, even if the spouse is deceased, and becomes in all respects the child of the adoptive stepparent. The adopted child, the custodial parent, and the adoptive parent have rights to inheritance and intestate succession by, through, and from each other.

By contrast, except for child support arrearages, the rights and duties of the child's former noncustodial parent are terminated, including the former parent's right to inheritance or intestate succession through or from the adopted child. Nonetheless, the adopted child and the child's descendants retain the right to inheritance or intestate succession through or from the former noncustodial parent. In this respect, the Act is consistent with the provisions of the Uniform Probate Code (UPC) [Title 72, ch. 1 through 5, and ch. 16, part 6] which apply to stepparent adoptions.

Changes From 1994 Uniform Act: In (2)(b) substituted "child" for "minor adoptee", substituted "either" for "the", and after "either parent" omitted "who is the adoptive stepparent's spouse or deceased spouse"; and after (2)(c) omitted subsection that provided "or a court order or agreement for visitation or communication with a minor adoptee which is approved by the court pursuant to Section 4-113" (not enacted in Montana).

1997 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 480, L. 1997, provided: "A statement of intent is required for this bill because the bill gives the department of public health and human services authority to adopt administrative rules. The rules must provide procedures for the putative father registry, including methods of notification, filing, and accessing information. The department shall adopt rules for licensing child-placing agencies. To the extent feasible, the rules should incorporate existing procedures. The needs of the child in the adoption proceeding must be the primary focus of the rules."

Severability: Section 172, Ch. 480, L. 1997, was a severability clause.

Applicability: Section 173, Ch. 480, L. 1997 provided: "(1) [Sections 1 through 156] [Title 42, chapters 1 through 7, and Title 52, chapter 8, part 1] apply to proceedings commenced on or after October 1, 1997.

(2) A petition for adoption filed prior to October 1, 1997, is governed by the law in effect at the time the petition was filed.

(3) The putative father registry requirements apply to children born on or after October 1, 1997."

Effective Date: Section 177, Ch. 480, L. 1997, provided: "(1) Except as provided in subsection (2), [this act] is effective October 1, 1997.

(2) [Sections 19 through 26, 28 through 38, 60, 65, 67, 68, and 75] [42-2-202 through 42-2-209, 42-2-214 through 42-2-218, 42-2-222 through 42-2-226, 42-2-230, 42-2-503, 42-2-604, 42-2-605, 42-2-606, and 42-2-611] are effective October 1, 1998."

DECISIONS AFTER 1997 GENERAL REVISION

Criteria for Intervention in Adoption Proceeding — Unfounded and Untimely Motion to Intervene Properly Denied: Couple A adopted a child through a judicial decree in the District Court of the Twenty-First Judicial District. Couple B also wanted to adopt the child and filed a motion, in the District Court of the Twelfth Judicial District where they lived, to intervene and set aside the final decree of adoption, despite the fact that some 6 months had passed since the final adoption decree was issued. Initially, neither District Court was aware of the competing adoption petitions. The Department of Public Health and Human Services had been reviewing both couples as potential adoptive resources at the same time and ultimately determined that because the child had formed a strong bond during placement with couple A for nearly 2 years, it would be in the child's best interests to be adopted by couple A. Couple B contended that the child was a member of their extended family and that the Department should have given them priority as adoptive parents. The Twenty-First District Court held that couple B had no standing to intervene as a matter of right pursuant to former Rule 24(a), M.R.Civ.P. (now superseded), and that permissive intervention under former Rule 24(b), M.R.Civ.P. (now superseded), was untimely and would undermine the purpose of adoption to the detriment of the child. Couple B's motion to set aside the final decree pursuant to former Rule 60(b), M.R.Civ.P. (now superseded), was also denied on grounds that as nonparties to couple A's adoption petition, couple B had no standing to make the motion and that, in any case, it was untimely because it was made more than 180 days after the final decree. Couple B appealed the denial of both motions, arguing first that they had a legal interest by virtue of the family placement preference in the Indian Child Welfare Act (ICWA) and legislative and Departmental policies favoring adoptive placement with extended family members. The Supreme Court noted that a mere claim of interest is insufficient to support intervention as a matter of right and that a party seeking intervention must make a prima facie showing of a direct, substantial, legally protectable interest in the proceedings. No such showing was made here because the child was not Indian and therefore not subject to the ICWA, nor did the relationship of second cousins meet the definition of extended family member. Couple B next argued that they should have been allowed to intervene under the permissive standard of former Rule 24(b), M.R.Civ.P., because the competing adoption petitions had common issues of law and fact. Couple B contended that their delay should be excused by their reliance on misrepresentations made by the Department. The Supreme Court agreed that the Department could have taken a more forthright approach and saved all the parties considerable time and expense, but couple B bore the responsibility for ensuring the timely filing of the motion to intervene. The Supreme Court noted that timeliness is a threshold issue when intervention is sought and that, although none of the factors are dispositive, most courts look to four factors in considering whether a motion to intervene is timely filed: (1) the length of time that the intervenor knew or should have known of its interest in the case before moving to intervene; (2) prejudice to the original parties, if intervention is granted, resulting from the intervenor's delay; (3) prejudice to the intervenor if the motion is denied; and (4) any unusual circumstances mitigating for or against a determination that the application is timely. The Supreme Court considered each factor in detail. Although the third factor weighed in favor of couple B, because denial of the motion to intervene effectively precluded any hope of their adoption of the child, the other factors weighed strongly against them. The District Court made a reasoned analysis when it determined that the motion to intervene was untimely and did not abuse its discretion in denying the motion. Last, because couple B did not address the threshold issues of former Rule 60(b), M.R.Civ.P., on appeal, the Supreme Court concluded that denial of the motion to set aside the final adoption decree on grounds of standing and timeliness was proper. In re Adoption of C.C.L.B., 2001 MT 66, 305 M 22, 22 P3d 646 (2001).

DECISIONS PRIOR TO 1997 GENERAL REVISION

Right to Intervene in Adoption of Indian Child — State Commitment to Indian Child Welfare Act: Prior to birth, Nellie Silk, paternal aunt of M.E.M., expressed an interest in caring for the child because she was aware of the parents' problems with parenting; however, after the child was born he was placed in foster care by the Hill County Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (SRS). Upon learning of the placement, Silk wrote to SRS requesting custody. SRS responded that placement with Silk would be inappropriate because of SRS efforts to reintegrate the family, but that Silk would be considered if adoption were to occur. After parental rights were terminated (see In re M.E.M., 209 M 192, 679 P2d 1241, 41 St. Rep. 636 (1984)), Silk was not informed of the proceedings, of M.E.M.'s availability for adoption, or of M.E.M.'s preadoptive placement with a non-Indian family. Silk's subsequent petition for adoption and motion to intervene were denied by the District Court. On appeal, the Supreme Court found that Silk had an interest in adoption stemming from the Indian Child Welfare Act of 1978 (ICWA), 25 U.S.C. 1901, et seq., and that the state had a strong and independent commitment to the principles embodied in the ICWA. Silk also had a right to intervene under former Rule 24(a), M.R.Civ.P. (now superseded), and although the District Court had ruled that her motion was not timely, the Supreme Court held that the motion must be granted in light of the fact that she was kept in ignorance and could not have been more diligent or earlier in her petition or motion. In re M.E.M., 223 M 234, 725 P2d 212, 43 St. Rep. 1684 (1986). See also In re K.H. & K.L.E., 1999 MT 128, 294 M 466, 981 P2d 1190, 56 St. Rep. 515 (1999).

Competing Petitions for Adoption: The court did not abuse its discretion by delaying determination of a jurisdictionally perfected adoption petition ready for hearing to consider subsequent petitions since the court cannot be compelled to fragment the case because of different filings and readiness for hearing of competing petitions. The best interest of the child is the paramount consideration. In re Adoption of Redcrow, 172 M 366, 563 P2d 1121 (1977).

Invalid Adoption Decree: An adoption decree was invalid for lack of notice to the natural parents and the absence of consent by abandonment since only 24 days elapsed from birth to filing of the adoption petition. That being so, laches and estoppel could not save the nonexistent decree but the best interests of the child justified a permanent custody award to the defendants. Elements of Parent-Child Relationship in Evaluation of Best Interest of Child: A natural parent's rights cannot be terminated under 40-8-111 (now repealed) independent of the determination that adoption is appropriate. DECISIONS PRIOR TO 1997 GENERAL REVISION

Postadoption Visitation Agreement Between Natural Mother and Adoptive Parents — Responsibilities of District Court: Groves consented to the adoption of her child by the Clarks on the condition that the Clarks sign a visitation agreement allowing Groves to have specified contact with her daughter. After the document was signed and the adoption completed, the Clarks tried to terminate Groves' contact with her daughter. Groves brought an action for specific performance of the visitation agreement, but the District Court held that the agreement was void from its inception under 40-8-125 (now repealed). The Supreme Court reversed, holding that In re C.P., 221 M 180, 717 P2d 1093 (1986), was distinguishable and that the Legislature would not have enacted 40-8-136 (now repealed) if 40-8-125 (now repealed) terminated the interests of the natural parent altogether. The Supreme Court also noted that 40-8-136 (now repealed) also places a burden upon the adoptive parents and, in this case, upon the adoption agency that acted as Groves' agent, to make sure that the visitation agreement was filed in accordance with that statute. The Supreme Court also concluded that under 40-8-114 (now repealed), the District Court has a responsibility to make sure that the enforcement is in the best interests of the child. Groves v. Clark, 277 M 179, 920 P2d 981, 53 St. Rep. 703 (1996).

Adoption by Stepparent — No Mandatory Termination of Grandparents' Visitation: There is no clear legislative intent or public policy that mandates termination of visitation for natural grandparents when a grandchild is adopted by a stepparent. Kanvick v. Reilly, 233 M 324, 760 P2d 743, 45 St. Rep. 1524 (1988).

Termination of Parental Rights While Maintaining Possibility of Parental Contact — Adoption Exception: There is no apparent conflict in terminating parental rights while simultaneously maintaining the possibility of parental contact. It was within the trial judge's discretion to terminate the mother's parental rights, due to her recurring mental problems, while allowing contact with the children if the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) determined it was in the children's best interests, since the children had a psychological attachment to their mother. However, when parental rights are terminated, continuing contact is allowable only in exceptional cases. In the event of adoption, continuing contact cannot be court-ordered even with Department approval. In re Declaring V.B., T.B., D.B., & B.B. Youths in Need of Care, 229 M 133, 744 P2d 1248, 44 St. Rep. 1838 (1987).

Parents to Have No Visitation Rights After Termination of Parental Rights Proceeding: Neither 40-8-125 (now repealed) nor 41-3-611 provides for a retention of visitation rights by the natural parent in the event of termination of parental rights and later adoption. In re C.P., 221 M 180, 717 P2d 1093, 43 St. Rep. 728 (1986).

Alternative Methods of Inheritance: Where claimant sought distribution of decedent's estate, claiming an acknowledgment in writing as required by section 91-404, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed), and an adoption as provided under section 61-136, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed), and offered proof of her right to inherit under both statutes, the claimant was not precluded from prevailing on the ground that she availed herself of both statutes and that they were alternate methods by which a person may become an heir. In re Glick's Estate, 136 M 176, 346 P2d 987 (1959).

Effect of Subsequent Will's Definition of "Issue" on Earlier Trust: Where testatrix included adopted grandchild in her will and therein expressly defined "issue" to include adopted children, this indicated clear intent to include adopted grandchild as "issue" in trust instrument created earlier by testatrix. Holter v. First Nat'l Bank & Trust Co. of Helena, 135 M 27, 336 P2d 701 (1959).

Adopted Child's Right to Inherit From Natural Parent Under Former Law: Adoption of child did not destroy his status as one of the issue of his natural ancestors, nor did adopted child lose his right to inherit from his natural parent. In re Kay's Estate, 127 M 172, 260 P2d 391 (1953).

Stranger Estopped to Collaterally Attack Adoption: Where all parties to adoption proceeding for many years considered it valid and acted on belief that valid adoption had taken place, evidence of such fact was properly admitted on collateral attack by stranger to proceedings who sought to revoke letters of administration granted to deceased's adopted son, and a party thereto or one claiming under him was estopped from attacking the order collaterally some 30 years after it was made. In re Hoermann's Estate, 108 M 386, 91 P2d 394 (1939).

Inheritance Through Adoptive Parents: As against collateral heirs, an adopted child, in absence of a will, succeeds to all the estate of the person adopting. In re Pepin's Estate, 53 M 240, 163 P 104 (1917).

1997 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 480, L. 1997, provided: "A statement of intent is required for this bill because the bill gives the department of public health and human services authority to adopt administrative rules. The rules must provide procedures for the putative father registry, including methods of notification, filing, and accessing information. The department shall adopt rules for licensing child-placing agencies. To the extent feasible, the rules should incorporate existing procedures. The needs of the child in the adoption proceeding must be the primary focus of the rules."

Severability: Section 172, Ch. 480, L. 1997, was a severability clause.

Applicability: Section 173, Ch. 480, L. 1997 provided: "(1) [Sections 1 through 156] [Title 42, chapters 1 through 7, and Title 52, chapter 8, part 1] apply to proceedings commenced on or after October 1, 1997.

(2) A petition for adoption filed prior to October 1, 1997, is governed by the law in effect at the time the petition was filed.

(3) The putative father registry requirements apply to children born on or after October 1, 1997."

Effective Date: Section 177, Ch. 480, L. 1997, provided: "(1) Except as provided in subsection (2), [this act] is effective October 1, 1997.

(2) [Sections 19 through 26, 28 through 38, 60, 65, 67, 68, and 75] [42-2-202 through 42-2-209, 42-2-214 through 42-2-218, 42-2-222 through 42-2-226, 42-2-230, 42-2-503, 42-2-604, 42-2-605, 42-2-606, and 42-2-611] are effective October 1, 1998."

WHEREAS, there are currently financial and other means of support for parents who choose to keep their children that are compelling parents of little means to keep their children; and

WHEREAS, the ability to provide similar forms of support to a parent who has chosen to relinquish a child in order to give the parent a chance to grieve and to assist the parent with counseling, temporary housing, mentoring services, job training, life skills development, budgeting and financial management, and educational opportunities will provide birth parents with another option that can help provide for their future after their children have been placed with adoptive families; and

WHEREAS, explicit authority for the program is necessary with the caveat that the program must be kept separate from any program for the placement of children and must be paid for by the agency with separate funds."

1991 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 274, L. 1991, provided: "A statement of intent is required for this bill because [section 7(3)] [42-10-127(3)] grants rulemaking authority to the department of social and rehabilitation services [now department of public health and human services] for the purpose of establishing procedures for continuing state medical assistance benefits in addition to federally aided benefits in certain cases. The legislature intends, as a matter of policy, that when the state provides medical assistance benefits in addition to the federal benefits available under an adoption assistance agreement, the benefits must continue when a child relocates to a state that has agreed under a compact to reciprocate by providing additional nonfederal coverage to children moving to Montana. It is intended that the medicaid card may be used as the identification for these services as well as for the true "medicaid" elements of the state program. It is intended that [section 7(3)] [42-10-127(3)] provide a means of improving, as far as possible, the chances for handicapped and other "hard-to-place" children to gain family settings for their development. It is intended that in those instances in which the plan for a particular child is adoption (with assistance) by parents who already live in another state or move there, the department of social and rehabilitation services [now department of public health and human services] may provide the full measure of its services to these special-needs children. It is intended that out-of-state adoptions be an additional resource for Montana children that would not be available if the department of family services [now department of public health and human services] had to rely on finding families for special-needs children on an entirely local basis."
